"As doctors, if we do the right thing at the right time, we can make a difference."

Dr. Kenneth A. Haller, Pediatrician, East St. Louis, Illinois, Member, American Medical Association

In one of the nation's poorest communities, Dr. Kenneth Haller is working not only to save children's lives, but to bring dignity to the lives of their parents.

He is the type of physician who brings distinction to our profession. He is the type of physician who upholds the highest ideals of medicine. He is also a member of the American Medical Association (AMA).

"I read the Principles of Medical Ethics of the AMA and was impressed by it. I'm proud to be a member," says Dr. Haller.

You are invited to join Dr. Haller and to join with him in his efforts to bring quality health care to those in need. Become a member of the American Medical Association today.

"I want to live."

Ashley has cancer. It sounds like such a grown-up disease, but each year, more than 6,000 American children will be stricken with cancer. Ashley, and thousands of others like her, will have a chance to beat cancer thanks to the research and treatments developed at St. Jude Children's Research Hospital.

TO ACCESS ALL THIS AT UNC...

THIS IS ALL YOU NEED. 1.800.862.6264

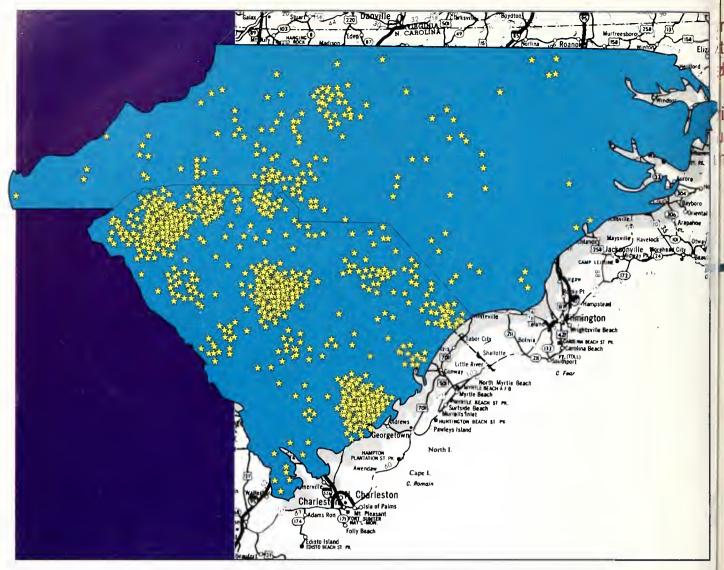

When you need a quick consultation, emergent transport, or want to refer a patient for specialized care, call the Carolina Consultation Center.

This nationwide, toll-free service is available 24 hours a day, seven days a week...to help you access the resources of UNC Hospitals and UNC School of Medicine.

The Consultation Center's specially trained staff will put you in touch with a colleague or specialist to help you in meeting your patient's unique needs. You (or a member of your staff!) can also access any UNC medical department or office. Just call to check on patient status, request medical records, register for CME courses, send faxes, or any other service UNC offers.

We'll also send you a copy of our Directory of Consultants FREE. With complete information on all our services and more than 650 faculty members. Give us a call...we're all you need at UNC.

What can a map tell you about a computer system?

Plenty—if, like this one, it shows how many medical offices in the Carolinas use a particular practice management system to run more efficiently, effectively, and profitably.

For example, it might show how a 16-year commitment to "Working for Physicians" has resulted in over 800 installations in North and South Carolina.

It might bring home how features like "on-the-fly" refiling, encounterform tracking, and direct transmission to North Carolina Medicare,
Medicaid, and Blue Cross/Blue Shield (with no per-claim charges) are improving physicians' revenue.

It could clarify how critical "one-call" support can be in helping offices stay productive—how telephone support staff, software and hardware engineers, technicians, trainers, and a fleet of service vans can provide support unmatched in the industry.

It might demonstrate how ongoing research and development brought innovations like the first integrated, direct electronic claims transmission in a practice management system.

Or it could validate the concept of regional focus: By selling systems only in the Southeast, a computer company can keep customers up-todate on the latest insurance filing requirements.

It could emphasize the flexibility of multi-user, multi-tasking software that runs on the most popular operating system in the world.

And it could illustrate the value of having a computer vendor with a vision for the future and the expertise to make that vision work for you.

TEAMWORK

The enjoyment and thritt of fall football has changed very little since we were kids. Too bad the threat of being sued couldn't have stayed the same...

Today, Crumpton Company represents thousands of NC doctors offering liability protection from 3 of the 4 largest writers of liability insurance in NC and the USA. We're not going to tell you that biggest is always best, but as history has witnessed, it sure helps to have the best team when your reputation is on the line.

Since 1939, we're ever more committed to serving you.

DEWEES ISLAND

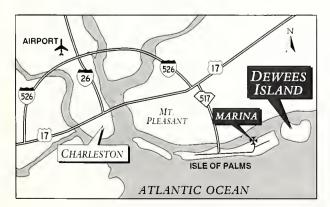

An Oceanfront Retreat to Call Your Own... Minutes from Historic Charleston and the International Airport

Located only a nine-minute ferry ride north of the Isle of Palms lies one of the South's last barrier islands available for development and the Charleston area's only private island.

Unlike other islands, there are no restaurants, lounges, or golf courses for outsiders to visit, while invading the privacy of homeowners. The only visitors on Dewees are guests of property owners.

This boat-access island is unique in other ways... a clean, wide beach stretches for over 2¹/₂ miles, development plans carefully protect the island's natural environment, transportation is restricted to electric vehicles, and a property owner's ferry runs on schedule. In addition, environmental covenants limit the number of homes to only 150.

The location of the island is extraordinary...its pristine surroundings are perfect for fresh & saltwater fishing, crabbing, shrimping, and oystering, yet it's just minutes to downtown Charleston and the International Airport.

Come explore Dewees, truly a private island to call your own. Prices start at $165,000, with two-acre oceanfront lots starting at $315,000.

comes to saving money through group malpractice programs, we wrote the book.

The costs associated with medical malpractice insurance have sky-rocketed. Yet health care providers cannot afford to reduce limits and liabilities to control these costs.

You'll find the solution in the Medigroup Purchasing Program, designed by the special risk experts at Cameron M. Harris and Company. By generating premium savings through increased buying power, hundreds of physicians, hospitals, clinics, and other health care providers throughout North Carolina have already gained bottom-line benefits from this program. Now it's your chance to save, too.

Get The Last Word On Medical Malpractice Savings.

Just call us for your free copy of our Medigroup report. You'll find a complete outline of the program, along with all the facts and figures you need to show your affiliate group how every member can save through this extraordinary plan. Even if you're not in an affiliate group, you owe it to yourself — and to your future — to see how the plan works.

So give us a call. The answers are right there in black and white.

Letters to the Editor

Editor's note: The January 1995, issue of the Journal, "Ashes to Ashes: Snuffing Out the Tobacco Epidemic," garnered a great deal of media attention and provoked discussion and debate among our readers. The letters published here, submitted to the Journal and to the North Carolina Medical Society, have been edited for space.

Where There's Smoke To the Editor:

Congratulations! The publication of a special issue of the Journal devoted to tobacco is long overdue in this state. When discussing addiction, no drug is more important than the nicotine contained in tobacco. When discussing public health, no issue is more important than tobacco and its relationship to disease, morbidity, and mortality. When discussing the negative influence of advertising on our children, nothing is more powerful than the billions of dollars the tobacco industry spends on these ads.

I especially commend Dr. Goldstein and his contributors. Thank you for bringing the Journal, the North Carolina Medical Society, and North Carolina physicians "out of the closet" to publicly address this addictive and deadly substance. Let us hope that such efforts are the beginnings of what will ultimately result in a tobacco-free environment.

Douglas E. Henley, MD, Pres.-Elect American Academy of Family Physicians 1806 Pugh St. Fayetteville, NC 28305

To the Editor:

Congratulations on the January issue of the Journal. The Journal's proactive discussion of the economics of tobacco and the role of medicine in the changing landscape of North Carolina was insightful. Your editorial committee and especially guest editor, Dr. Adam Goldstein, are to be commended.

Public health must continue its progress in controlling tobacco by consistently presenting the magnitude of the problem to the public and the professional community. It is easy to get distracted by other competing health priorities. Through publications like this one, however, we regain our focus and conviction to curtail the most preventable cause of death facing society today.

We encourage your advocacy for tobacco control and await future issues of the Journal addressing this subject.

John B. Sowter, DDS, Chairman Wake County Board of Health P.O. Box 14049 Raleigh, NC 27620

To the Editor:

I congratulate you on the excellent January issue of the Journal. It is time that we physicians became organized concerning the health hazards of tobacco. Even so, I think we are still tiptoeing around the problem. DDT was outlawed because it killed ospreys and eagles. Lead was removed from paint because a few babies got lead poisoning from chewing on their cribs. Asbestos was banned to preventa relatively small number of cases of asbestosis or mesothelioma. The time is now right for organized medicine to call a halt to the tobacco industry.

I sympathize with tobacco farmers, but I sympathize more with the large number of patients with devastating diseases brought on by tobacco that I have seen in my practice during the past 40 years. I do not believe that banning cigarettes and tobacco products will present the same problems as alcohol prohibition. Smoking is, after all, a very overt behavior and bootleg tobacco would have to be indulged in at home and after hours. A complete ban would cut down greatly on tobacco consumption and the resultant health problems.

An economic factor that few people mention is the economic loss from fires related to smoking. If we banned to-bacco, the match industry would be affected. Rather than having matches lying around freely in homes, restaurants, and other public places, we would probably hide one package of matches along with our candles for use in the event of an electric power failure.

Recently I gave a talk here to laypeople concerning the prevention of cardiovascular disease and lung cancer. I distributed copies of the Journal's "Health Watch" section, which listed smoking cessation programs.

Frederick H. Taylor, MD Charlotte Cardiothoracic Surgical Associates, PA 300 Billingsley Road Charlotte, NC 28211

To the Editor:

Thank you for devoting another issue of the Journal to a topic with profound public health implications. I found the articles most interesting and well-researched. Keep up the good work!

Ronald H. Levine, MD, MPH, State Health Director NC Dept. of Environment, Health and Natural Resources P.O. Box 27687 Raleigh, NC 27611-7687

To the Editor:

I would like to express my gratitude to Journal staff and the NC Medical Society for selecting tobacco as the topic for your January issue. I believe this Journal will serve as a valuable resource to those of us working with individual clients or with local communities.

Donna R. Dinkin, MPH 6206 Clarkwood Circle Greensboro, NC 27410

To the Editor:

The January issue of the Journal is a masterpiece of information about the "to-bacco epidemic." I sincerely hope, and wish, that you can find ways to get this valuable educational material into many hands through public and school libraries and other effective channels. I hope that the youth of our state will be widely exposed to the subject.

H. Lee Large, Jr., MD 8919 Park Road Charlotte, NC 28210

To the Editor:

The NC Child Advocacy Institute would like to join the NC Medical Society in its anti-smoking efforts, and we commend the Society on the timely publication of the January Journal.

As advocates for children in North Carolina, we must be advocates against tobacco. The use of tobacco affects children directly through the health consequences of smoking and indirectly through secondhand smoke diseases and health problems associated with low birth weight babies born to smoking mothers. Added to these results are the financial and emotional crises children of smokers suffer because of the death and illnesses of their parents.

We support the ban of cigarette vending machines in locations where minors have access, and would appreciate updates on pending legislation.

John S. Niblock, President NC Child Advocacy Institute 1318 Dale St., Suite 110 Raleigh, NC 27605-1275

To the Editor:

Up front, my wife and I are extremely happy to have given up smoking. Our children have given up the habit. I hope that none of our seven grandchildren ever chooses to smoke. Having said that, I sincerely hope that after knowing the risks involved, they and not the government will dictate whether or not they should assume the risks of this legal product.

Tobacco is not good for you...that is a given. Nor is getting drunk, drinking too much caffeine, or eating too much chocolate or too many french fries. Is it tough to quit? You bet. Giving up vanilla ice cream with chocolate syrup also wasn't easy! The only consoling aspect of this meekly comparable deparavation was that it was my choice...under no Orwellian influence. The Tobacco Institute has always said that "risk factors are associated with smoking as with 10,000 other products or activities." They also know that with choice comes consequence.

Over a period of time, tobacco and other unhealthy products will find their place. Knowing the down side of all the products and then making an informed choice is what this country is all about. Catastrophe awaits the government that outlaws any of them...either by direct legislation or unreasonable taxation. Even our most vocal anti-tobacco politicians know that. They don't want to see the expected scenario associated with the prohibition of tobacco.

For the tobacco industry, this has become a civil rights issue wrapped in the 1st Amendment. Individual freedom is one factor that appears to have been omitted from the raging tobacco issue. To take away the most precious element of our democracy, freedom of choice, only leads us in a direction that none of us wants to confront.

A time from now, when we are perhaps reduced to the sterility of a dead branch, people will say, "Freedom? You gave it away!" And they will be saying it to us.

The concept of government-provided security is alluring, yet it is also one that history tells us to regard with dubiety.

Robert L. Phillips, MD 1021 E. Wendover Ave. Greensboro, NC 27405

To the Editor:

The article on nicotine addiction in the January Journal (NC Med J 1995; 56:40-5) piqued my interest. Treating nicotine addiction requires an intensive therapeutic approach, I offer these tips:

- Refer patients to support groups to educate them about nicotine addiction.
- Urge patients to use nicotine patches for at least one year. Patches are expensive. It may be cheaper to prescribe the 21 mg patches and let patients cut them to tailor their dosage.
- Initiate treatment for severe depression prior to smoking cessation. Paxil and Prozac seem to be effective, but other anti-depressants are probably useful. Expect to use anti-depressant therapy for at least one year.
- On the last day of patch use, start the patient on a five- to six-day course of steroids (such as Medrol Dose Pak).

Ethnic Issues

To the Editor:

As a "university" physician, teaching the meaning and practice of medicine, I am insulated from the "real" world. Nonetheless, I try to experience vicariously what the real world physicians are going through. To this end, I read the Bulletin that accompanied the December Journal. After wading through several pages of bureaucratic directives and numbers, I encountered an explanation of how we are to identify patients by "ethnic origin." But what if a patient from Ghana (black?) with Caucasian (Aryan?) features (Arab? Indian?) is married to a white, dark-complected (American Indian?, Hispanic?) North Carolinian? Would their child be identified as "other"? A blonde-haired, blue-eyed patient with sickle hemoglobinopathy (black?) patient comes to mind.

A seminar we held last semester as part of a first-year medical school course in social medicine examined the utility of ethnic labels from a biological or social point of view. The young people in the seminar, including two students who identified themselves as Lumbee Indians (one very dark skinned, one very light) agreed that in today's world "ethnicity labels" have little practical value from a medical care standpoint (although socioeconomic, educational, or behavioral identification does). And they have historical overtones of evil.¹

I certainly don't plan to expend any energy determining the "ethnicity" of my patients and will urge my administrative support people to use any system they want (without my involvement) to fill out "the form"—(random comes to mind since it was indicated in the publication that the excessive use of "other" will lead to retribution).

I urge our medical society to react vigorously against the tyranny of this form (and any of the many other "forms" that seem to be defining present-day medicine).

Alzheimer's—Good News? To the Editor:

"There is good news...Alzheimer's disease is rapidly becoming manageable." Really?

The quote appeared in the December "Health Watch" section of the Journal (Alzheimer's Disease: New Hope in the '90s," NC Med J 1994;55:599-602). Let us overlook the poor organization and muddled definitions and look for the meat in the article. After brief sections on memory testing and symptoms, we are told about important researchers in North Carolina.

How is Alzheimer's disease "becoming manageable"? At the subheading, "Importance of Early Diagnosis," we are assured that "There are many new therapies available now..." but only one is mentioned, the drug Cognex (tacrine). The rather substantial information that is available about tacrine is summarized in one sentence saying that it "may stabilize or improve function in up to one-half of Cancer Pain Management Awareness Week: May 14-20 To the Editor:

May 14-20 is Cancer Pain Management Awareness Week in North Carolina. The North Carolina Cancer Pain Initiative (NCCPI) is coordinating this effort and will host a day-long role modeling conference at the Friday Center at UNC-Chapel Hill on Saturday, May 20, for selected health care professionals. The role modeling program was developed by the Wisconsin Cancer Pain Initiative with funding from the National Cancer Institute to educate physicians and their clinical partners about issues of cancer pain and to assist these health care professionals in transferring the knowledge to students and peers.

As the science of diagnosing and treating cancer expands, more patients benefit from early detection and they may have more treatment options. By the same token, more non-oncologic physicians now care for cancer patients with other medical needs, putting these doctors on the front lines of cancer pain management.

Medical schools teach little about managing pain of malignant origin and many clinicians are uncomfortable using potent analgesics. These physicians may also be unaware of the variety of non-pharmacologic analgesic options. NCCPI goals are: 1) to make health care professionals aware of the resources available; 2) to reinforce to cancer patients, their families, and caregivers that most cancer pain can be controlled; and 3) to encourage those dealing with cancer to discuss pain management options with their health care providers.

With the recent publication of "Clinical Practice Guidelines for Management of Cancer Pain," the Department of Health and Human Services, through the Agency for Health Care Policy and Research (AHCPR), has made state-of-the-art knowledge available to both clinicians and patients. Congress created the AHCPR in December 1989, to enhance the quality, appropriateness, and effectiveness of health care services and access to these services. These guidelines provide clinicians with information about the scope of practicing medicine as it applies to cancer pain management. Contact me at the address below to obtain a copy of these guidelines.

The NCCPI is one organization among many dedicated to the tolerable management of cancer pain. Established in 1991, the NCCPI comprises physicians, nurses, pharmacists, social workers, psychologists, representatives from the NC division of the American Cancer Society, and the Cancer Information Service. The NCCPI assesses the current status of cancer pain management and identifies barriers to cancer pain control; promotes knowledge and positive attitudes about cancer pain relief among patients and the public; strengthens knowledge, skills, and attitudes of health care professionals and paraprofessionals about cancer pain management; and serves as a resource for education and communication about cancer pain relief for all North Carolinians. NCCPI members have already published studies addressing some of these concerns.

During Cancer Pain Management Awareness Week, the NCCPI hopes to focus media attention on the topic of cancer pain management as it relates to individual patients, their families and caregivers, and North Carolina's professional health care providers.

patients." Or may not! There is no mention of the serious side effects and liver damage. This is the only substantive (although inadequate) information in the entire article about "many new therapies available now."

I have read every word in this article and cannot help but wonder if it was accepted by an editor who had failed to read it.

Knut Schmidt-Nielson, DrPhil, DrMed J.B. Duke Professor of Physiology Emeritus Duke University Medical Center Durham, NC 27710

From the Editor:

Professor Schmidt-Nielson is quite correct; the material in "Health Watch" is sent directly to the publisher by the Medical Society and has not (until now) been reviewed by the Journal's editor. The new policy is to have all "Health Watch" articles reviewed by the Journal's editorial staff. Henceforth we will accept all blame (and part of any credit) due.

Measuring Intraocular Pressure To the Editor:

About five years ago, at a meeting in Dallas, our workshop group was asked how many of us still used Schiotz tonometers to measure intraocular pressures in the office. I was the only one who raised my hand. The consensus interpretation of the data available then implied that this screening technique was not cost-effective.

Does the work done by Merritt et al ("Ocular Hypertension: A Convenience Sample Survey of Blood Pressure and Intraocular Pressure Determinations in Blacks," NC Med J 1994;55:608-9) imply that we should modify this position?

I must confess that I have continued to use the Schiotz tonometer because it is cheap and safe and the validity of the measurement can be so easily checked by referral for applanation tonometry. Vision loss from a condition as easily treated as glaucoma seems such a waste.

> John R. Dykers, Jr., MD, FAAFP P.O. Box 565 Siler City, NC 27344

Dr. Merritt responds:

The issue of cost-effectiveness of Schiotz indentation or Goldmann applanation techniques must be viewed from the perspective that the sensitivity and specificity of intraocular pressure (IOP) measurement

glaucomatous blindness.1

(IOP) measurement alone are not high enough that present screening examinations can prevent

Vertical CDR

Horizontal CDR

The Baltimore Eye Survey (BES)2 has confirmed the increased prevalence of ocular hypertension in blacks living in St. Lucia³ and Barbados.⁴ But it has also added to our confusion regarding the role of IOP as an etiologic variable. Roughly 50% of the glaucomatous eyes (and patients) had screening (initial) IOP below 21 mmHg (using the highest pressure in either eye). The BES did not find any effect of treatment on IOP in blacks with documented glaucoma.2 The risk of glaucomatous optic nerve damage did increase when the IOP was >29 mmHg, but 50% of glaucomatous eyes had screening applanation tonometric readings <21 mmHg.

The BES specifically evaluated the ability of applanation tonometry, cup: disk ratios and the narrowest rim width to correctly classify subjects into diseased (glaucomatous) or non-diseased states. No single factor or combination of factors gave cutoff variables with reasonable sensitivity and specificity.⁵

Primary care physicians should evaluate the optic nerve carefully, paying attention to the cup:disc ratio. Studies using stereoscopic photos and sensitive optic nerve imaging (Topcon Image Analyzer) indicate that normal blacks have significantly more optic nerve cupping and smaller neuroretinal rims than do whites.^{6,7} Clinicians should suspect glaucoma when the vertical cup:disc ratio (CDR) is equal to 0.8 in blacks (see Table, below).

Our convenience sample of blacks in eastern North Carolina should serve to inform the primary care providers of the effect of blood pressure on IOP. But always, screening for glaucoma should begin with a good history for glaucomatous blindness in the family, blood pressure determination and optic nerve evaluation.

Community-Based Hypertension Control Programs

Chanetta R. Washington, MPH

Each year more than 500,000 people in the United States have a stroke. Nearly 150,000 of them die. During 1992 in North Carolina, 4,568 citizens died of stroke. North Carolina is one of 11 states that make up the "stroke belt" (Fig. 1, at right) in which stroke mortality rates are at least 10% higher than the national average. In 1991, North Carolina had the sixth-highest stroke mortality rate in the nation.

Since 1972 stroke death rates have declined by 57% nationally, but stroke remains the third-leading cause of death in North Carolina. Table 2, right, shows that the race-, sex-, and age-adjusted mortality rates for cerebrovascular disease are higher for all groups in North Carolina than in the US. Rates for non-whites in North Carolina are significantly higher than rates for whites. Reducing this pervasive burden of death and disability is a primary concern of health care providers in our state.

Hypertension is the primary antecedent to stroke. Hypertension awareness and adherence to treatment have increased significantly since 1970, but current estimates indicate that only 21% of hypertensive subjects have their blood pressure controlled to a level of 140/90 or lower.² People whose blood pressure is above this level remain at increased risk for stroke, coronary heart disease, and kidney disease.

Based on findings from the 1992 NC Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System, we estimate that 1.22 million North Carolinians age 18 years and over have been told by their doctor that they have high blood pressure. Since the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute (NHLBI) estimates that only 21% of hypertensive subjects have their blood pressure controlled to 140/90 or lower, we infer that more than 900,000 adults in North Carolina have poorly controlled high blood pressure and are at risk for stroke.

Ms. Washington is Program Manager for Project DIRECT (Diabetes Interventions Reaching and Educating Communities Together), Wake County Health Department, Raleigh. At the time of this writing, she headed the Health Education Branch, Division of Adult Health Promotion, NCDEHNR, Raleigh.

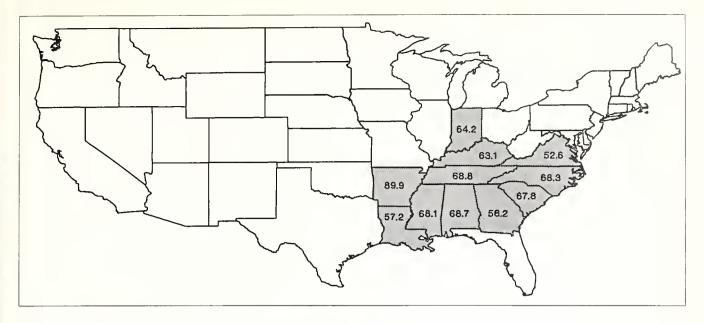

The NC Strike Out Stroke Project

The NHLBI funds state health departments in the stroke belt to implement health education interventions aimed at reducing the overall risk of stroke. One of these, North Carolina's Strike Out Stroke (SOS) Project, promotes awareness of the importance of long-term control of high blood pressure in order to reduce risk for stroke. Blacks are the prime target of the Project because they are at three times the risk of stroke as whites.⁵ Blacks develop hypertension at an earlier age, and at all decades of life hypertension is more severe in blacks than in whites.²

The NC SOS Project has two major activities: 1) public education through mass media channels and 2) professional education. Public education and mass media interventions are targeted at blacks through familiar channels such as churches, radio stations, local newspapers, social clubs, and organizations. Promotional materials such as church fans and posters disseminate the message about high blood pressure control. Professional education activities, developed primarily for staffs of local health departments, review current research in hypertension control, techniques for improving long-term adherence to treatment regimens and use of specially tailored educational resources to reach blacks.

Community-Based Hypertension Control Programs

Lifestyle modifications (weight reduction, increased physical activity, and moderation of sodium and alcohol intake) are a definite part of hypertension treatment.² The efficacy of such lifestyle modifications has been well documented, but long-term compliance with a modified lifestyle is far less impressive. For example, only 5% of obese patients were able to maintain weight loss after one year.⁶ Better dissemination of health information about treatment of hypertension will require effective communication among patients, health care providers, research and educational institutions, industry, and citizens. Familiar community settings can be used to reinforce the message about long-term control of high blood pressure that health care providers give to their patients.

Unfortunately, the very lifestyle practices that need modification for hypertension control are rooted in longstanding traditions, habits, culture, and established preferences. These practices are often supported and reinforced by the people and institutions that form the community network in which individuals live. Thus enlisting the support of community networks is crucial to achieving healthy lifestyle practices. The likelihood that a target group will adopt a desired behavior can be predicted from its attitudes toward and perceptions of benefits of the behavior along with its perceptions of how peers view their behavior. Behavioral intervention research confirms the importance of community-based programs in providing support to people who are striving to control hypertension.

Community-based hypertension control programs are most effective when they are planned and implemented with the support of clinicians and other health care providers.² Community-based programs should include representation from professional agencies such as local health departments, hospitals, and voluntary agencies, as well as from target groups and key community leaders. Broad-based participation in planning, implementing, and evaluating hypertension control programs will increase community "ownership" and improve chances for long-term success.

Community-based programs have the greatest chance of succeeding when they include the following:

- · broad representation by varied groups in the community,
- comprehensive mass media campaigns specifically designed to reach various target groups,
- trained professionals who can provide detection, education, referral, and treatment services for patients,
- multiple implementation sites (schools, worksites, churches, supermarkets) so that the program reaches all segments of the population,
- multiple strategies to reach various segments of the population including high-risk groups and,
- multiple targets, including individuals and groups with increased as well as those with "normal" cardiovascular risk factors.²

Putting community-based hypertension control programs into churches, workplaces, barber shops, and beauty salons can significantly increase the potential for reaching high-risk groups. Many churches lend themselves to preventive health activities because they recognize their social and cultural as well as religious missions. They have established communication networks, provide support through social networks, and have existing facilities, committees, and volunteers to implement interventions. Use of worksite locations capitalizes on employers' vested interest in having healthy workers. Other nontraditional sites for hypertension control programs include barber shops and beauty salons that have been used effectively in blood pressure screening and for encouraging adherence to treatment regimens. They give an opportunity to reach population segments not reached by more traditional programs.

Community programs that assist residents in maintaining control of high blood pressure are crucial to reducing the single most important risk factor for stroke. The National Stroke Association says that stroke is "America's most neglected disease." Carefully planned and implemented hypertension control programs can change this by increasing awareness of the importance of hypertension control and thereby reducing the risk of stroke.

The Burden of Diabetes in North Carolina

Michelle Crozier Kegler, MPH, Eugene J. Lengerich, VMD, MS, Marilyn Norman, RN, MPH, Lee Sullivan, MS, and Georjean Stoodt, MD, MPH

Diabetes mellitus is considered the seventh-leading cause of death in North Carolina,¹ but estimating the burden of diabetes solely from listings of "underlying cause" on death certificates may be misleading (see the paper by MacCormack and McLean, NC Med J 1994;55:544-6). For example, diabetes is not mentioned on the death certificates of approximately 50% of decedents known to have had diabetes.²-4 Furthermore, statistics based solely on underlying cause of death (the most frequently used basis for computing mortality statistics) underestimate the burden of diabetes because it is approximately three times more likely to be recorded as a contributing cause of death rather than as the underlying cause.¹ Such recording errors occur even when diabetes mellitus initiates and enhances the disease process that eventually leads to death of the individual.

To gain a more complete and accurate appreciation of the true burden, we need to use other measures such as the prevalence, rates of hospitalization, multiple-cause mortality, and economic cost of diabetes. In this article we briefly report the application of these other measures to diabetes in North Carolina, thereby helping health care providers, program managers, and policy makers more fully appreciate the true burden of this disorder in our state.

Prevalence of Diabetes Mellitus

Adults. The prevalence of diabetes among adult North Carolinians was estimated from the Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System (BRFSS). BRFSS is an annual, random telephone survey of non-institutionalized North Carolina residents who are at least 18 years of age. 5 Respondents were considered to have diabetes if they said "Yes" to the question "Have you ever been told by a doctor that you have diabetes?" This report uses data provided by the 7,506 respondents to the 1988-1991 surveys, weighted to represent the population of North Carolina.

We estimate that 290,000 adult North Carolinians (5.8% of the total population) have been diagnosed with diabetes (Table 1, next page). Among blacks, the prevalence was 6.9% for males and 11.0% for females; among whites, the prevalence was 4.7% for males and 5.2% for females. Prevalence generally increased with age. There were a few exceptions to this rule, particularly among black males, but this may have been due to the relatively small sample size.

Youths. We used rate estimates from Minnesota⁷, to predict that approximately 4,300 North Carolinians under 25 years of age have diabetes (Table 2, next page). However, these rates may not be directly applicable to North Carolina because the original study was conducted among a predominantly white population.

Diabetes-Related Mortality

Between 1980 and 1989, 41,676 North Carolina decedents had diabetes listed as a contributing cause of death on their death certificates, 4.3 times more than the 9,771 decedents who had diabetes listed as the underlying cause of death (Table 3, page 143). In North Carolina, the diabetes-related death rate (in which death certificates listed diabetes mellitus [ICD-9 rubric 250] as the underlying or contributing cause of death), after the crude mortality rate was age-adjusted using the direct method

Rates were highest in the northeastern region of the state, which has a relatively high percentage of black residents.

From 1980 to 1989, diabetesrelated mortality in North Carolina increased 6%. The rate increased disproportionately (31%) among non-white males. Among white males, it increased 14%; among non-white females, 6%; among white females, 0%. Between 1980 and 1989, rates for non-white women remained higher than rates for any of the other three sex/race groups.

Hospitalizations Because of Diabetes

The records of inpatients discharged from all civilian hospitals in North Carolina between October 1, 1988, and September 30, 1989, were analyzed for diagnosis of diabetes. Table 4, at right, shows that diabetes was mentioned as a diagnosis in 66,067 hospitalizations, an annual rate (age-adjusted using the direct method and the 1980 age-specific population of North Caro-

Half (33,050) of the discharges that mentioned diabetes also mentioned cardiovascular disease. Less than 5% of diabetes-related hospitalizations recorded lower extremity amputation (1,696) or renal disease/kidney transplant (1,451).

Economic Costs of Diabetes

Charges for diabetes-related hospitalizations during 1988-1989 totalled $490 million (Table 4) or $73 per North Carolina resident. Discharges that also listed cardiovascular disease accounted for more than half ($268 million) of the total charges for diabetes-related hospitalizations.

Hospitalization charges alone, however, do not portray the full cost of diabetes. We also need to count outpatient costs and indirect costs such as foregone wages due to short-term morbidity, long-term disability, or premature death from diabetes. Using a model developed by the CDC,9 we estimate that, during 1990, the total cost of diabetes in North Carolina was $1.2 billion. Approximately 46% of this total was for inpatient ($490 million) and outpatient ($84 million) care; the remaining 54% ($664 million) reflects indirect costs.

Discussion

Our analysis shows that the traditional measure of the public health importance underlying cause mortality-does not fully characterize the burden of diabetes. In part, this may be a result of the perceptions of physicians since, on average, diabetes was mentioned as an underlying cause of death three times less frequently than it was listed as a contributing cause. Approximately 290,000 (5.8%) North Carolina residents have been told that they have diabetes, yet many more, possibly 290,000 more, have diabetes but have never been formally diagnosed.10

There are more than 66,000 diabetes-related hospitalizations per year in North Carolina, and diabetes costs the residents of North Carolina an estimated $1.2 billion annually. These burdens are not equally shared among the races: the rate of death due to diabetes was 1.8 times higher in non-whites than in whites.

Our data are not without limitations. First, the prevalence of diabetes was estimated from self-reports. In a BRFSS validation study among a 99% white population in New York, 80% of women and 67% of men who were clinically confirmed diabetics self-reported that they were diabetic.¹¹ Almost all

(98%) of those who reported being diabetic were subsequently clinically confirmed to be diabetic. These statistics imply that more than the 5.8% of NC residents who self-reported being diabetic actually are. Secondly, diabetes is demonstrably underreported on death certificates. Therefore, the diabetes-related mortality rate given here is probably an underestimate of the true rate. Finally, we estimated economic costs using a model that was not developed specifically for North Carolina; consequently, its applicability to North Carolina is unknown. Even so, in spite of these limitations (most of which underestimate the true figures), our data clearly demonstrate that diabetes is a major cause of mortality, morbidity, and economic cost in North Carolina.

Recently, the Diabetes Complications and Control Trial (DCCT), the largest diabetes study in history, demonstrated that keeping the blood sugar at near normal levels can reduce the risk of eye, kidney, and neurologic disease for type I diabetics. ¹² According to the American Diabetes Association, "there is no reason...to believe that the effects of better control of blood glucose levels would not apply to type II diabetes." ¹³ Any incremental improvement in blood sugar levels (through diet, exercise, oral hypoglycemic agents, or conventional insulin therapy) is worthwhile. ¹⁴ In addition, the DCCT results suggest that tight glycemic control will save money by preventing and controlling the complications of type I diabetes. ¹⁵

The North Carolina Diabetes Control Program is working to reduce the burden of diabetes in North Carolina by assessing and monitoring the disease and its complications, developing and implementing new approaches to prevention and control, and coordinating efforts within North Carolina. As part of this effort, the North Carolina Diabetes Control Program has developed and disseminated fact sheets containing detailed surveillance data for the entire state and each of its 100 counties. Recommendations

Due to the large, and occasionally unappreciated, burden of diabetes in North Carolina and the potential to prevent the complications from diabetes, we recommend:

- Regular collection, analysis, and reporting of data about diabetes in North Carolina, including data other than underlying cause mortality statistics;
- That decision-makers use such surveillance data, especially that for diabetes, to plan for and allocate scarce health resources;
- That public and private health-care providers offer effective preventive services to diabetics and their family members in order to reduce the burden of diabetes in North Carolina.

Unusual Presentation of Trisomy 13

Chawki A. Lahoud, MD, Amanda C. Austin, BSN, and Leah W. Burke, MD

Trisomy 13 syndrome is a multiple malformation syndrome caused by an extra copy of chromosome 13. Common features include cardiac defects, polydactyly (extra digits), posterior scalp defects, a prominent nose, cleft lip and palate, and central nervous system defects, including holoprosencephaly. Trisomy 13 syndrome is most often diagnosed prenatally or within the first few days of life. The average neonatal hospital stay for infants with this syndrome is 11.0 days;1 about half of the affected children die within the first month of life and 90% within the first year, but longterm survivors have been well described.^{1,2} The most common causes of death are cardiopulmonary arrest (69%), congenital heart disease (13%), and pneumonia (4%).1 We report here an infant who did not have a prolonged neonatal hospitalization and in whom the diagnosis was not made until 11 months of life.

Our Patient

An 11-month-old female infant was admitted to her local hospital because of a "choking" episode after which she became unresponsive. She was successfully resuscitated, but developed seizures and was transferred to Pitt County Memorial Hospital in Greenville for further evaluation.

The infant was born after 36 weeks of gestation to a 23-year-old woman with two living, healthy children. The pregnancy was uncomplicated and the baby was delivered vaginally from a footling breech position. Birth weight was five pounds and polydactyly was noted on initial exam but evaluation was deferred to a later date. She was discharged home with her mother, but was again hospitalized for one week at age eight months for dehydration and a urinary tract infection.

"The average neonatal hospital stay for infants with Trisomy 13 syndrome is 11.0 days; about half of the affected children die within the first month of life and 90% within the first year, but long-term survivors have been well described." 12

During the second hospitalization facial dysmorphisms as well as developmental delay and polydactyly were noted and a genetics evaluation requested. At age eight months, her height was 71.5 cm (25th percentile), her weight was 6.6 kg (<5th percentile), and her head circumference was 41 cm (<5th percentile). Her craniofacial features included a small, short, wide head (brachymicrocephaly); a large anterior fontanelle; a prominent forehead; posteriorly rotated and lowset, simple ears (Fig. 1); decreased intraorbital distance (hypotelorism) with hypoplastic orbital ridges and down-slanting palpebral fissures; a depressed nasal bridge with a bulbous nasal tip; a narrow upper lip with a smooth philtrum (Fig. 2); a high-arched palate; delayed dentition; and redundant nuchal skin. Other findings included a heart murmur, umbilical hernia, hepatosplenomegaly, and a sacral hemangioma, as well as post-axial (ulnar and fibular) polydactyly of all four extremities (Figs. 3 and 4).

A computed tomograpic scan of the head showed atrophy of the frontal brain. Chest radiograph was normal, but an echocardiogram revealed a patent formen ovale and mildly diminished contractility. An upper GI series and gastric emptying study demonstrated gastroesophageal reflux; renal ultrasonogram demonstrated increased echogenicity of the kidneys with mild enlargement.

Pertinent laboratory findings included hypochromic anemia and an abnormal peripheral blood karyotype of 47,XX,+13, found in 68 of 75 cells counted. The remaining seven cells had random loss of chromosomes other than chromosome 13. This result was consistent with a diagnosis of Trisomy 13.

The patient was treated with thickened oral feeds and positional reflux precautions and discharged back to the referring hospital. She was subsequently found to have significant visual and auditory deficits. The patient expired suddenly at 17 months of age, without a preceding illness. Her death was thought to be due to a central nervous system defect.

Discussion

Trisomy 13 syndrome is a condition that, if not diagnosed prenatally, is usually obvious at birth because of both physical defects and poor physical health. Affected infants are often poor feeders, and have cardiovascular compromise and neurologic impairment to the extent that life-sustaining functions such as coordinated breathing, suck, and swallow are affected. Many times the diagnosis is suspected by the primary physician and merely confirmed at genetic evaluation.

This infant, however, did not have life-threatening problems in the neonatal period, but presented with a late history of feeding difficulties. At age eight months her poor postnatal growth and developmental delays were noted, as well as her facial dysmorphisms, but the only physical defect obvious at birth was her polydactyly.

Polydactyly, either as an isolated defect or as a part of a syndrome, is often heritable. Post-axial polydactyly of the upper extremities is transmitted in an autosomal dominant fashion and is 10 times more common in blacks than in whites.³ However, it is quite rare to have post-axial polydactyly of all four extremities in the absence of a significant family history of the same. In such cases, a thorough evaluation is warranted, including consultation with a geneticist so that a syndrome diagnosis, if applicable, can be made and recurrence risk and prognosis can be discussed with the family.

The unusual presentation of our patient illustrates two points: 1) There is a need for a genetic evaluation when unusual, although not life-threatening, birth defects are noted. 2) Trisomy 13 syndrome, although usually fatal within the first year, can be associated with long-term survival. Sudden death, probably due to central nervous system defects, is always a risk and parents should be appropriately counseled.

He wanted to jump. We said, "how high?"

CPO Prosthetics & Orthotics patient Brandon Barbour was born in 1983 with spina bifida. With the aid of his orthoses, he walked before he was two. Today this remarkable child, who loves to jump on his trampoline, is an active fifth grader who keeps up with the other children in his class.

In January of 1994, CPO was the first facility to bring the Oregon Orthotic System (OOS) to the region, and Brandon was one of the first patients to be fit with the System. But, the Oregon System is more than a simple orthotic device. It is a complete orthotic treatment plan, which addresses deformities in all planes, and the System uses computer and video analysis to insure the best results.

CPO will be bappy to schedule an in-service presentation on the OOS or on any other orthotic or prosthetic related topic for you or your entire staff. For more information, please call us at 1-800-394-6362 for the location nearest you.

Laparoscopic Cholecystectomy vs. Open Cholecystectomy

Consider the following vignette:

The scene: a conference room at a community hospital.

The players: Stanley, a senior physician who is chairman of the hospital privileges committee and Harold, who has practiced general surgery in the community for 30 years.

Stanley: Harold, I am delighted you've come to see me today but I'm sorry we need to have this conversation. It's just as difficult for me as for you.

Harold: This is outrageous! I have been in practice as a general surgeon here for 30 years! What do you mean you are taking away my privileges to do cholecystectomies?

Stanley: Now listen, you have got to catch up with the times. You are the only surgeon left in this hospital who doesn't do laparoscopic cholecystectomies. It's the national trend and you are still doing only open cholecystectomies.

Harold: Of course! I was never trained in laparoscopic cholecystectomies. But I have a good record of case selection, a low morbidity and mortality rate, and satisfied patients. Why should I do laparoscopic cholecystectomies?

Stanley: It's the trend, Harold. The hospital stay is shorter. The cost is lower.

Harold: Yeah, and utilization has gone up because everyone and his uncle is doing lap-cholecystectomies for less and less stringent indications. In the end, it ends up costing everybody more. Are you telling me I'm a dinosaur?

Stanley: Don't get excited. If you're not willing to get up to speed in this new procedure, then you will have to do other things. We are going to pull your privileges for doing cholecystectomies unless you can post the patients as laparoscopic procedure with open cholecystectomy only as a back up.

Harold: You are forcing me to be retrained, whether I want to or not.

The Journal invited several North Carolina surgeons to comment on this vignette. Is this the future of surgery? Must all surgeons be trained in laparoscopic cholecystectomy? If they are not, should their privileges to do cholecystectomies be revoked? Is this vignette what we can expect to see in the future? The comments of our group of surgeons (listed alphabetically) follows.

-Edward C. Halperin, MD, Deputy Editor

Stephen W. Blievernicht, MD, General Surgeon, Greensboro

The actual technical removal of the gallbladder and attention to non-injury to the common duct or surrounding bowel is the same in both operations. It is simply that the laparoscopic technique allows a quicker recovery and there is less tissue damage. I do not believe that privileges should be revoked as long as a physician successfully accomplishes the object of treating hepatobiliary disease.

On the other hand, I do believe that physicians will self-select against themselves if they persist with only open cholecystectomy because: I) The public is extremely aware of the decreased pain and discomfort with the laparoscopic procedure. Surgeons who cannot offer it would see their volume of cases decrease accordingly. 2) There will be a bias against such physicians when they try to join groups or form large insurance companies for whom cost considerations are a factor. 3) Most physicians seek further training because they appreciate the lower morbidity and mortality in patients with medically borderline cardiopulmonary function. I think Harold will select himself out of opportunities for cholecystectomy and this will materially impact his practice. Having said all that, I still see absolutely no issues concerning his privileges unless his morbidity and mortality rates for open cholecystectomy fall above the accepted norm for other physicians utilizing the same technique.

I compliment the Journal for taking this issue to general surgeons at large and requesting our input. It is important that grass-roots physicians become politically active and retake control of medicine. If we move initially in service and secondarily as businesspeople we will save our profession, regain respect, and regain control.

John T. Daniel, Jr., MD, General Surgeon, Durham

I feel that Harold and Stanley are both right in that they perceive that they are doing the best thing for their patients. Nevertheless, I think that Harold should be given the opportunity to schedule and perform open cholecystectomies and not lose those privileges if he does not become credentialed to do laparoscopic cholecystectomies.

I suspect that market forces in the form of fewer referrals will affect Harold's patient load and will force him to either learn to do laparoscopic cholecystectomies or lose that portion of his practice. In the future, I expect to see many of today's general surgery procedures to be done laparoscopically. These include: appendectomies, groin hemia repairs, vagotomies, anti-reflux procedures, bowel resections, and anastomoses in addition to cholecystectomies. Surgeons not capable of performing these procedures will be at a competitive disadvantage. I feel that the comparable mortality rates, lower morbidity, shorter stays in hospital and out of work, and the lower costs of laparoscopic procedures will make the open approach to many general surgical procedures obsolete.

Theodore N. Pappas, MD, Professor of Surgery, Duke University Medical Center, Durham

Open cholecystectomy is still a viable operation and there are clear indications for it. Therefore, Harold should not have his privileges to do open surgery taken away because he does not perform laparoscopic cholecystectomy. If the surgeon is appropriately selecting patients for open cholecystectomy and does that operation safely, he should be allowed to continue. But it is the hospital's responsibility to monitor the situation and be certain that patients who qualify for laparoscopic cholecystectomy are offered that operation.

In a similar way, surgeons should be monitored to be sure that they are using laparoscopic cholecystectomy only in the appropriate patient population. Patients who may need open cholecystectomy include those who: 1) have had multiple right upper quadrant operations in the past; 2) have gangrenous cholecystitis associated with maximum inflammation; 3) will require common duct exploration, and there is no one available in the community to perform laparoscopic common duct surgery; and 4) are undergoing laparotomy for another indication. There are many other relative contraindications to laparoscopic cholecystectomy that might tilt the balance in favor of open cholecystectomy.

James S. Wilson, Jr., MD, General Surgeon, Regional Surgical Associates, Durham and Chapel Hill

Laparoscopic cholecystectomy is a procedure that is patientdriven. Patients seek out surgeons to perform the laparoscopic procedure and request that the operation be done this way. I do think that the laparoscopic era has probably seen more cholecystectomies done for marginal indications. Previously, patients with non-specific symptoms were not willing to undergo an open procedure with its discomfort and prolonged recovery time and risks of a less than absolute excellent result.

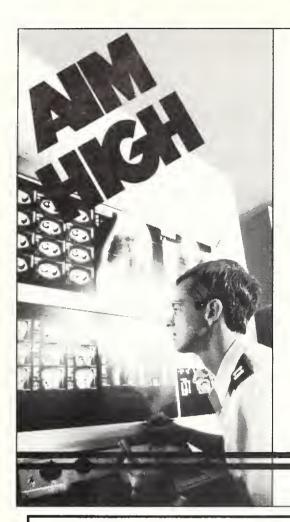

It seems to me that another problem associated with the shift to laparoscopic procedures is that we are turning out surgeons who do not know how to do difficult cholecystectomies. Only by doing hundreds of open cholecystectomies does one become comfortable enough with the anatomy to approach the difficult gangrenous gallbladder.

Like Harold, I myself may be viewed as a dinosaur in years tocome. I am not ready to jump on the laparoscopic herniorrhaphy bandwagon. I would hate to think that I would be denied the privilege of repairing a hernia from an anterior approach just because some governing body felt that laparoscopic procedures were more cost-effective. I think laparoscopic appendectomy is merely an exercise and does not offer any clinical benefit. And if I had a colon cancer, I would never want a laparoscopic colectomy for I would fear the surgeon would not be able to resect the node-bearing tissues adequately through the laparoscope.

If we look at cost as a guideline to choice of procedures, I don't feel that laparoscopic cholecystectomies offer that much of a savings. At least our hospital manages to charge just as much for a laparoscopic procedure with a one-day stay as for an open procedure with a four-day stay.

Be it right or not, most of us tend to perform the procedures we were trained to do. There is a good deal of superstition in surgery. If a procedure done in a certain way has worked well over the years, you are reluctant to change just because the literature says there is a better way. I have good results repairing hemias from an anterior approach, and so I am very reluctant to perform laparoscopic repairs. Nothing is more devastating to me than to see a patient back in the office with a recurrent hemia. Not so much because my pride is insulted but because of my compassion for the patient. I have had hemias repaired myself and I know the significant amount of discomfort and time lost from work associated with that surgical procedure. I want to perform the operation that I feel has the best chance of long-lasting good results.

A Patient's Guide to Cancer Pain

TREATMENTS CAN MINIMIZE SUFFERING Jo Ann Dalton, EdD, RN, FAAN

Patients rarely ask why they experience pain. This is particularly true when it comes to the treatment of cancer pain. Unfortunately, patients are conditioned to expect pain if they have cancer. Both patients suffering from cancer and their families should ask not only why they have pain, but what can be done about it. This Health Watch guides cancer patients through treatment of cancer pain, offers practical advice to help cancer patients understand their pain and seek advice from caregivers about pain.

While we do not know the exact cause of cancer pain, we know that pain can have several causes. Pain may occur because there is a tumor pressing on a nerve or because a tumor is growing in an organ surrounded by a capsule which is stretching. A tumor or scar tissue that develops after treatment of a tumor may obstruct such parts of the body as intestines or blood vessels. In other cases, the pain may be due to infection, or to the process that is referred to as inflammation. It may occur because the body's cells are growing abnormally and have traveled from their primary location to bone tissue.

From research based on those who work with patients, we know that pain is experienced by approximately 70 percent of patients who have cancer in its more advanced stages. In contrast, it may only be experienced by 30 percent of patients undergoing active treatment or in some degree of remission of their disease. The difficulty is that cancer is not always a predictable disease; therefore, the stages of pain will differ just as the stages of the disease change. Because of this, many patients assume pain is inevitable. Patients should understand that although pain is not inevitable, many patients experience unnecessary or unnecessarily severe pain.

Caregivers have discovered that patients sometimes suffer with pain because they are reluctant to tell their doctor or nurse about their pain because they do not want to distract the attention of their caregiver away from other treatment related to their disease. Patients sometimes hesitate to report their pain because they believe that they ought to be able to tolerate it or because they believe that the pain is some form of punishment. Patients sometimes say that they are fearful that if they take their full dose of medication it will eventually become less effective in the future.

Jo Ann Dalton, EdD, RN, is an Associate Professor in the University of North Carolina- Chapel Hill School of Nursing.

Pain is inadequately treated when patients fail to report problems to family members because they do not want to cause unnecessary distress among relatives. In other situations, patients do not report their pain because they feel that it affects relationships with spouse and family members in a negative way. Families, of course, do become distressed and stressed at times because of a loved one's frustrations with pain. However, family members should be aware of the presence of pain.

Both patients and family members may become fatigued because they must cope with undertreated pain, producing a vicious cycle in which the fatigue produces further distress, in turn producing more pain. Further, patients, families and

pain and 10 describes the

caregivers alike must realize that unrelieved pain interferes with sleep, appetite, mood, activity — all related to quality of life. Additionally, it may in some way interfere with their positive response to the treatment of their cancer. To help avoid undertreatment of cancer pain, here are some suggestions to guide patients in discussing pain with caregivers:

- Patients must provide accurate descriptions of the location of their pain;
- Patients should use a scale to describe its intensity. For example, 0 to 10 scale where "0" means no pain and "10" means the worst pain imaginable.
- Patients should use descriptive words such as "aching," "sore," "cramp," "burning," and "searing" to describe their pain. These terms will help doctors, nurses and pharmacists understand the type of pain that they are experiencing and help the caregiver select the best approach to treatment.
- Patients should be prepared to discuss previous pain experiences and treatment. This information will be helpful in choosing the best type and dose of treatment to use with the current pain problem. Experiences about previous treatments that have not worked will help evaluate appropriate or inappropriate uses for the present pain problem.

- Patients should be prepared to discuss not only medications they have taken, but also other treatments that have helped. Such procedures as relaxation therapy distraction, nerve blocks or surgical procedures are worth discussion. Caregivers can help patients select a method that will be effective and useful. It is rare to find a method that is effective and practical for all patients.
- Patients should be prepared to discuss the duration of the pain or its pattern. For example, patients should notice whether the pain is worse in the morning or evening, whether it is worse before or after meals, and whether it awakens the patient at night. Knowing the pattern of the pain experience can help determine treatment.
- Patients and their families should be aware that there are many different types of medications that can help their pain and many ways to use those drugs. Patients need to be informed about drugs and their uses.

Patients often think first about such drugs as Ibuprofen, Advil or Motrin. Taken for arthritis or minor aches, we know that they are helpful for pain that occurs in the bones. The property of these drugs that makes them helpful for arthritis also makes them helpful for bone pain that cancer patients sometimes experience. However, one of the problems with the use of these drugs is that they sometimes cause irritation to the stomach and gastrointestinal tract, and this problem can increase with increasing doses of the medication. For this reason, it is sometimes necessary to change to medications that act in different ways. Examples of alternative drugs,

'Permitting pain to go up and down or fluctuate is not good for the body's response...' sometimes considered stronger medications, are codeine and morphine. These drugs are called narcotics, which means they are subject to controlled distribution. But it does not mean that the person who is taking the drug should worry so much about control that the worry interferes with the adequate management of the pain problem. Narcotics can cause some patients to worry that they will become addicted to drugs. While it is clearly safer to avoid drugs for social use, avoiding drugs that are helpful in cancer pain treatment is not a good choice.

 Patients should seek answers and advice from their prescribing physician about the use of narcotics. In some instances of cancer treatment, caregivers will advise that after a period of time some medications may need to be taken in larger doses if they are to continue to be helpful. Or these drugs may need to be decreased gradually when the pain is less severe or completely relieved. These characteristics are not unlike those of medications like Insulin or Prednisone, drugs whose dosages must be increased after being taken for a long time or must be either increased or decreased gradually. In all cases involving pain treatment with narcotics, the prescribing physician should be asked for advice about the use of the drug, its long-term implications and its ability to treat the pain. In cases of terminal illness, many caregivers have fewer concerns about the problem of addiction.

Patients taking medications like codeine and morphine sometimes worry about problems like nausea, constipation and drowsiness. All of these can be the natural consequence of the way that the drugs work. If the patient adequately understands these side effects before the use of the drug and after consultation with the prescribing health professional, these characteristics should not be a deterrent to taking the medication. Patients experiencing nausea when taking one of these medications should let the caregiver know so a medication can be ordered to control nausea for a few days, after which the nausea often goes away. The problem of constipation needs to be handled somewhat differently because it probably will not go away as long as you are taking the medication on a regular basis. Frequently, a laxative or something like prune juice is recommended on a regular basis to prevent constipation. More tips on drug use for pain:

- Patients should know that pain medication taken on a regular basis is more effective than pain medication only taken after the pain gets to be so severe that it has become harder to treat.
- Permitting pain to go up and down or fluctuate is not good for the body's response, just as allowing a fever to fluctuate is hard on the body.

Patients should try to avoid allowing pain to shoot up and down without a normal pattern.

If you are concerned about drowsiness that sometimes occurs with the use of narcotic-type medications, your doctor may give you a drug to counteract this effect for a few days, or you may find that the drowsiness decreases after your body adjusts to the dose of medication that you are receiving. It is important for patients and family members to remember that because undertreated pain causes fatigue, the patient may only be resting well when their pain is finally under control.

It is important to bear in mind, however, often when a patient is experiencing rapidly escalating pain, i.e., pain that is becoming more severe over a short period of time — the patient may choose to be sedated with medication rather than suffer with undertreated pain. Patients and families may want to discuss this possibility with their doctor or nurse before the situation occurs in order to make an informed decision about the appropriate treatment for them. This is the patient's right, a right that should be respected by both professional and family caregivers!

 Patients may also experience relief from pain using what we refer to as "nonpharmacologic" treatment—i.e., treatment other than with medications. This type of treatment may include heat, cold, distraction, rubbing a spot, or perhaps just a change in position.

Patients should know that caregivers recognize that the treatment of pain related to cancer is a challenging task. Decisions about the use of the many medications that can help treat pain require time and energy from the patient as well as from caregivers. The highest level of treatment occurs when there is good communication between patients, families and caregivers.

Barriers to Prenatal Care in Mecklenburg County

A Study of 500 Women

Kathleen Underman Boggs, PhD, Jonnie McLeod, MD, and Thomas M. Stubbs, MD

We know that inadequate prenatal care results in poor outcomes of pregnancy. Nevertheless, a disproportionately large number of women in North Carolina still receive inadequate prenatal care.

Since 1988, when North Carolina had the highest infant mortality rate in the nation, many new legislative and financial efforts have been directed at improving the care of pregnant women. The Governor's Commission on Reduction of Infant Mortality has facilitated coordination of community efforts to address the problem. Infant death rates declined from 11.5/1,000 live births in 1989 to 9.9 in 1992. The rate rose slightly to 10.6 in 1993 because of an increase in neonatal deaths due to severe prematurity among non-whites and an increase in SIDS deaths among whites. 1 According to State Health Director Dr. Ronald Levine, the downward trend noted over the past five years continues. Nevertheless, NC ranks among the five worst states in infant mortality.

From 1982-1987, Mecklenburg County's infant death rate was 11.72/1,000 live births. In 1988, the rate was 13.08, which was higher than the state average.² Alarmed by these statistics, a group of concerned citizens and health care providers formed the Mecklenburg Infant Mortality Reduction Project in 1989. As a part of this, we carried out a research study to identify the barriers to prenatal care perceived by pregnant Mecklenburg County women. The findings from our study have been used to create new community-based health care partnerships, to promote community-based awareness, and to establish intervention programs.

Methods

We designed a descriptive, correlational study to examine what motivated mothers to obtain prenatal care, and what prevented them from obtaining adequate levels of care. Based on a review of the published literature, panel expertise, and the outcomes of similar surveys conducted elsewhere, we constructed a 186-item survey questionnaire to define the demographic characteristics of mother and infant (including financial and medical status), the personal attitudes and values of these pregnant women, and their problems in accessing the health care system.^{3,4} An expert panel reviewed and revised the questionnaire, and it was pretested on 10 postpartum women.

To elucidate the problem of inadequate care, we disproportionately sampled a large group (400 women) who received inadequate care. We used age and ethnic group data from 1989 vital statistics, to assure that these women would be chronologically and ethnically representative of all the women in the county who delivered after receiving inadequate prenatal care.2 For example, since 33% of Mecklenburg women who received inadequate care were white, 33% of our sampled population was white; since 32% of women who had received inadequate care were under 20 years of age, 32% of the sampled population was under 20. We also surveyed 100 women who received adequate prenatal care to allow for statistical comparison.

The accepted measure of adequate prenatal care is the Kessner Index, which takes into account when prenatal care was started and the number of prenatal visits made. The adaptation of the Kessner Index used by the State of North Carolina defines adequate prenatal care as beginning by the end of the 12th week of pregnancy and providing nine or more

Dr. Boggs is Associate Professor, UNC-Charlotte, 1861 Monterosa Road, Concord 28025, Dr. McLeod is Chair, Mecklenburg Infant Mortality Reduction Project, P.O. This study was completed under grants from Duke Endowment, Foundation of the Carolinas, The March of Dimes: Piedmont Chapter, Mecklenburg County Health Department: Infant Mortality Reduction Project. visits if the baby reaches 36 weeks of gestation (or a lesser number of visits if the baby is gestationally premature). Inadequate care records no prenatal visits, or an initial care visit during the third trimester, or a total of four or less visits for gestations lasting 34 weeks or longer. A third level, known as not adequate refers to care that begins after the 12th week or provides less than the required number of visits.² For purposes of this study we combined not adequate and inadequate as inadequate care.

Nationally, the percentage of women who obtained first trimester prenatal care increased during the 1970s, but this trend did not continue during the 1980s. The decline in the number of women seeking early care was especially prominent among black women.

Our study protocol was approved by appropriate agency administrators and internal review boards for research on human subjects. We obtained written permission from each subject soon after delivery. We determined eligibility and obtained demographic information by review of hospital records.

Between November 1990, and May 1991, professional employees of a marketing firm conducted personal, face-to-face, structured interviews with 500 Mecklenburg residents who delivered infants at one of three hospitals in the county. Each interview lasted approximately one hour. No incentives were offered for participation and confidentiality was guaranteed. Approximately 6% of the women approached declined to participate.

Data were analyzed to determine frequencies and measures of central tendency. Comparisons between groups were tested statistically using Chi square, Phi, Cramer's V statistic, and t-test as appropriate.

Results

The average age of mothers was 23 years (range, 13-46). The average age of the infant's fathers was 25.9 years (range, 15-51; 17% were teenagers. As Table 1 shows, two-thirds of the study participants were non-white (63%), and most women (65%) were unmarried. There were substantial numbers of single women both in the group of 100 receiving adequate care and in the group of 400 receiving inadequate care. However, a significantly larger proportion of the group receiving inadequate care were single (68% compared to 56% of the adequate care group).

Women who received inadequate care were more likely not to have private insurance. We found that only 15% of those in the inadequate care group had private insurance compared to 48% of those who received adequate care. Twenty percent of the women who received inadequate care were completely uninsured ("self-pay" patients).

Sixty-two percent (309 of 500) of the women reported education to high school or beyond. Those who received inadequate care were more likely than women who received adequate care to have only a high school education (41% compared to 28%). Nearly 29% (143 of 500) of the total group stated that they were in school during the pregnancy. Of those mothers aged 19 years or less, 69% said they were in school sometime during the pregnancy. Of the 58 girls who were in school, 39 girls quit before the end of the pregnancy.

Women who received inadequate care were more likely to have had more children and have had them spaced more closely together than women in the adequate care group. The difference between groups was statistically significant. The average participant had one other child, but this ranged from no other children to nine.

Women who received inadequate care were more likely to be unemployed (42%) than women who received adequate care (26%). The availability of maternity leave may have increased access to care since working women in the adequate care group were significantly more likely to be on maternity leave than those in the inadequate care group.

Problems Affecting Use of Prenatal Care

Descriptive statistics were used to summarize the problems these women perceived as preventing them from obtaining prenatal care (Table 2). The problems fell into two categories: personal problems and problems accessing the health care system. Statistical comparisons were made to examine differences between groups who received adequate or inadequate care. In general, women in the two groups reported the same kinds of problems, but women in the inadequate care group reported more problems.

Personal barriers to care related to women's attitudes about and motivation to seek care while pregnant, as well as lack of information or support. When comparing women according to adequacy of care, both groups reported a high rate of unplanned pregnancy (81% of those receiving inadequate care and 70% with adequate care). Teens and single mothers had particularly high rates of unplanned pregnancy (91% each). Women who did plan their pregnancy were significantly more likely to initiate care during their first trimester.

Problems reported more frequently by women who received inadequate care included: not feeling like keeping an appointment (13%) or forgetting appointments (10%); not receiving support from the baby's father (23%); feeling a lot of stress during the pregnancy (42%); and > not feeling happy about finding out about this pregnancy (42%). Most women reported high levels of support from friends and kin, but women receiving inadequate care were significantly less likely to report support from the baby's father and were less frequently living with the baby's father. Both groups reported somewhat high rates of feeling unhappy about learning of this pregnancy, but a significantly larger proportion of those who received inadequate care reported being unhappy.

getting babysitters, etc. A majority of the women interviewed reported experiencing one or more barriers of this type. However, women in the inadequate care group were significantly more likely to report system barriers to care (Table 2). System barriers include financial problems paying for the cost of prenatal care, transportation difficulties, problems getting child care during their appointment (if they had another child), difficulty getting an initial appointment with any care provider, taking time off from work or school for a prenatal visit, and long waiting times in the clinic or office. Cost was of greatest concern to whites, married women, adults with insurance, and women in the self-pay category.

Women receiving inadequate care were significantly more likely to report problems getting appointments, finding transportation, or having to wait too long after arriving for an appointment. Problems obtaining transportation to health care sites was one of the most frequently cited and significant barriers to care (p=<.001). This was especially true if the woman went to a public clinic rather than to a private physician (p=<.001), was unmarried, or had less education. Seventeen percent of women in the inadequate care group reported difficulty getting an appointment compared to only 5% in the adequate group. In fact, 81 women had to wait more than a month after calling for an appointment for prenatal care.

Discussion

Our primary purpose was to identify and compare the problems perceived by women who got inadequate prenatal care and women who got adequate levels of care. The problems identified by 500 women in one urban North Carolina county (Mecklenburg) closely reflect those reported in the literature from other sites. Women who received inadequate care were more likely to be single, to lack private health insurance, and to have had more children. We can draw no conclusions from their age or from the fact that they were more often non-white than those who received adequate care since we purposefully chose our sample of non-whites and adolescents to correspond to the percentages of all Mecklenburg County women receiving inadequate care who were non-white (67%) and who were age 19 or younger (32%). Contrary to other studies that cite unemployment and low educational level as factors disposing to poor prenatal care, we found Mecklenburg County women likely to be high school graduates and to be employed.

Personal problems that act as barriers to care and the problems women encounter as they try to access the health care system are well described in the literature. Our results support the existence of these barriers for both those receiving adequate care and those who did not, but the extent of some of these barriers to care had not been previously documented. We did find that women who received inadequate care were significantly more likely to report the greater number of barriers.

We were struck by the high rate of unplanned pregnancy in both groups of women. Since women who received adequate care were significantly more likely to have planned their pregnancy, we would support a strong recommendation to focus on preconception counseling as a means of improving prenatal care. Among personal barriers reported, the strong association between inadequate care and feelings of unhappiness when the woman learned of the pregnancy suggest that questioning about this at the initial care visit may be a useful screening procedure.

Lack of care in the first trimester was the main reason most women in this study did not meet North Carolina standards for adequate levels of care. Twenty-five percent of women in the inadequate care group said that they did not even know they were pregnant until after the first trimester. A number of prior studies have associated inadequate care with less education, but this was not a major significant factor in our study. Of course, the way women process and use information may be of great importance since one out of every four women in our inadequate care group said that she had not received needed information or help during pregnancy. Teachers and care providers need to find alternative, more effective ways to communicate such information. And since mere information often does not translate into behavior, we need to try alternative methods to help women use information. Such efforts need to start preconceptually. In a 1988 study done by the NC Coalition on Adolescent Pregnancy, county schools in North Carolina reported that the average curriculum for grades K-12 devoted only seven hours per year to any type of family life education.

The problems of access to the health care system we encountered are similar to those reported from other areas of the nation. They include difficulty getting appointments, cost, transportation problems, and lack of child care. Many of these barriers can be changed. Lack of transportation, particularly to health department clinics, was the most frequently cited barrier. Since the results of this study were presented to the community, a bus route has been changed and additional special transportation has been provided. Communities elsewhere have issued taxi vouchers, used church-sponsored vans, or volunteer drivers to provide transportation. Establishing clinics in geographic proximity to the areas where large numbers of patients reside seems an obvious but not always feasible strategy. In a few places vans fully equipped for health care exams have been driven to the neighborhood.

We found that many women had to wait a long time to obtain an initial prenatal appointment. This verified information reported in the local news media. Eight-one of our participants reported a wait of more than a month after calling to be seen. None of the women who waited more than a month were seen by private physicians. This suggests system overload as well as a priority in scheduling women in their second or third trimester.

The Mecklenburg County community has begun several efforts to deal with these and other problems reported in our study. We obtained funds to hire staff to help coordinate the many scattered local initiatives; we held a workshop to help convey to employers the problems women encountered in getting time off from work or school for prenatal care. We have sponsored community awareness programs, and the health department has opened an evening clinic.

Other system barriers such as financial problems require more extensive reforms in the health care delivery system. Of interest, we found that only women on Medicaid failed to report cost as a major barrier to care. Since costs were so frequently cited as a problem, perhaps we should make this a priority in health care reform efforts. In Mecklenburg County, community physicians have established a "Prenatal Partners" program to provide free prenatal care to women who have no insurance and who feel financially distressed by this. Since the completion of our study, North Carolina has raised the level of income that will eliminate eligibility to 185% of poverty level. As a result, many more women now qualify for Medicaid coverage.

Our findings suggest that multiple, complex factors determine whether or not a woman will get inadequate prenatal care. Our results outline a profile of women who are at greatest risk of getting inadequate care; the results are congruent with previously published information. Such women are likely to be less educated, unmarried, have more and younger other children, be Medicaid recipients or self-pay patients, be unemployed, smoke, feel stressed, receive insufficient support from the baby's father, and to be unhappy about being pregnant. They are likely to encounter two or more barriers as they try to access the existing health care system to obtain their prenatal care.

Our study group recommends increasing access to care and reducing perceptions about problems in access by prioritizing first trimester initial visits, improving transportation to care agencies, and decreasing the time patients must wait to be seen. Further recommendations include changing our educational focus and developing strategies that actively engage women and their employers in early prenatal care.

Instructions for Authors

The North Carolina Medical Journal is a medium for communication with and by members of the medical community of this state. The Journal will consider for publication articles relating to and illuminating medical science, practice, and history; editorials and opinion pieces; letters; personal accounts; poetry and whimsical musings; and photographs and drawings. Papers that relate to the present, past, or future practice of the health professions in North Carolina are especially pertinent, but manuscripts reflecting other perspectives or topics are welcomed. Prospective authors should feel free to discuss potential articles with the editors.

Manuscript Preparation

Prepare papers according to the "Uniform Requirements for Manuscripts Submitted to Biomedical Journals" (N Engl J Med 1991;324:424-8) with the following exceptions: 1) no abstract is needed; 2) no running title is needed; and 3) report measurements in metric units; use of the International System of Units (SI) is optional.

Submit a cover letter and either a 3 1/2-inch hard disk or 5 1/4-inch floppy computer disk that contains the text written in MS DOS- or Macintosh-compatible format (WordPerfect, Microsoft Word, Displaywrite, or ASCII), and at least one hard copy of the text. (No disks are necessary for Letters to the Editor unless particularly lengthy.) Double space text, with one-inch margins, and type on one side of each sheet of paper. Title page should include addresses, and telephone and facsimile numbers of the corresponding author.

Submit illustrations, in duplicate, in the form of highquality color 35mm slides or 5-by-7-inch or 8-by-10-inch glossy photographs, or as black-and-white glossy prints (5by-7-inch or 8-by-10-inch). Label all illustrations with author's name, number them sequentially according to their position in the text, and indicate the orientation of the images, if necessary. Do not write directly on the backs of prints. This can damage them. If figures require printing in four-color process, the author may be asked to pay printing fees or a portion thereof.

Type figure legends, double-spaced, on a separate sheet of paper. Tables should be typed, double-spaced, one to a single sheet of paper. All tables must have titles and consecutive Arabic numbers. Include tables, graphs, or charts on disk, if possible.

Keep references to a minimum (no more than 15, preferably 10 or fewer), retaining those that document important points. The "Uniform Requirements" cited above contain the format for references. Authors are responsible for the accuracy and pertinence of all citations.

Avoid abbreviations entirely if possible; keep them to a minimum if not. When used, completely define abbreviations at the first point of usage in the text.

Manuscript Review and Editing

A medically qualified editor reads all manuscripts and, in most instances, sends them out for further review by one or more other members of the North Carolina Medical Society. Authors' cover letters must include a line that states that their submitted manuscripts are not under consideration for publication elsewhere. Decisions to publish or not are made by the editors, advised by the peer reviewers.

We encourage a relatively informal writing style since we believe this improves communication. Imagine yourself talking with your unseen audience—as long as this doesn't lead you to scientific or linguistic inaccuracy. Be brief, clear, simple, and precise.

We edit accepted manuscripts for clarity, style, and conciseness. Except for letters, authors receive a copy of the edited manuscript for their review and approval before publication. Manuscripts not accepted will not be returned.

Authors retain copyright to articles published in the North Carolina Medical Journal, but the North Carolina Medical Society copyrights the contents of each entire issue. Requests for permission to reprint all or any part of a published article must be submitted in writing to the address below and negotiated with the author and editor jointly. Reprinted material must carry a credit line identifying that it appeared in the North Carolina Medical Journal.

"Captain-of-the-Ship" is Dead

Are North Carolina Physicians and Surgeons Still Liable For the Acts of Other Health Professionals?

Kenneth De Ville, PhD, JD

The so-called "captain-of-the-ship" doctrine held attending surgeons and physicians liable for the negligence of health professionals who worked with them even if they themselves had not acted negligently. In January 1994, in Harris v. Miller, the North Carolina Supreme Court completely scuttled the already foundering "captain-of-the-ship" doctrine in this state. However, the Court replaced it with a legal rule that leaves unclear the circumstances under which surgeons and physicians will be liable for the negligence of health professionals with whom they work. The "captain-of-the-ship" doctrine and the current "borrowed servant" doctrine apply to lead physicians of any specialty, but the issue arises most often with surgeons in an operating room setting.

Sources of Physician Liability

We know that physicians may be held liable for damages caused by their own negligence. In addition, under the theory of respondeat superior ("let the master answer"), physicians may also be held liable for the negligent acts of their employees or agents. Respondeat superior makes no requirement that the physician/employer be negligent in any way. The doctrine frankly imposes liability without fault. Physicians may be said to be "vicariously liable" for the acts of employees, a liability based not on their own negligence but on their relationship to the wrongdoer. Vicarious liability is conceptually and doctrinally distinct from related actions such as negligent supervision wherein physicians may be deemed negligent in monitoring the actions of other health care professionals. In vicarious liability actions, persons are held financially liable for the negligent acts of third parties, even though they are not themselves negligent and are not aware of the third parties' actions.

The "captain-of-the-ship" doctrine extended vicarious physician liability for the acts of affiliated health professionals even further. Originating in Pennsylvania in the late 1940s, the "captain-of-the-ship" doctrine held that a surgeon was vicariously liable for any negligence that occurred in the operating room. Under the doctrine, all hospital employees and independent professionals working in the operating theater became temporary employees or agents of the attending surgeon. As a result, surgeons could be held liable for the negligence of any operating room personnel, even if they had not anticipated the negligence and were not themselves negligent.³ The "captainof-the-ship" doctrine, while it reigned, reflected the social, professional, and legal expectations that physicians exercised virtually absolute and final authority over all they surveyed. Clearly these assumptions rested on an increasingly flimsy foundation, but for a short period cultural beliefs about the profession supported this unique form of vicarious liability.4

Background: NC Law Before Harris v. Miller

Many states adopted some form of the "captain-of-the-ship" doctrine even if their courts did not refer to it by name. For example, the NC Supreme Court applied a version of the rule as early as 1952 in Jackson v. Joyner. In that case a child had died as a result of anesthesia complications after a tonsillectomy performed by Dr. Joyner. The NC Supreme Court reasoned that Joyner, "as surgeon in charge" had full control over the manner in which anesthesia had been administered. Consequently, the surgeon, even if blameless himself, could be held vicariously liable for the negligent acts of the anesthetist. Jackson assumed that the "surgeon in charge" was liable for any negligent injury to his or her patient, even in the absence of individual negligence.⁵

The reign of the "captain-of-the-ship" rule was not long. By the 1970s North Carolina and other states had begun to limit the application of the doctrine. In Starnes v. Hospital Authority the NC Court of Appeals held in 1976 that a surgeon should not be held vicariously liable for the acts of an attending anesthetist. According to Starnes, a surgeon could be held liable for the negligence of another professional in the operating room only if the surgeon had reason to know of the other professional's negligent or wrongful conduct. Starnes represented a clear move away from "captain-of-the-ship" and the legal presumption that a surgeon is always liable for the acts of operating room personnel; Harris v. Miller completed this withdrawal.

Harris v. Miller

In Harris, the husband of a woman who died as a result of injuries received during surgery claimed that the defendant surgeon was vicariously liable for the negligence of a nurse anesthetist employed by the hospital. At trial the defendant surgeon argued that the anesthetist was neither his employee nor his agent. The trial court judge agreed, ruling that there was insufficient evidence to establish an employee or agency relationship, and granted a directed verdict in favor of the surgeon. The surgeon could not be held vicariously liable for the damages caused by the purported negligence of the anesthetist, and a jury found that the surgeon himself had not acted negligently.

The plaintiff appealed the directed verdict and asked the NC Court of Appeals to allow him to retry the case and have the issue of vicarious liability decided by a jury. The court of appeals denied the plaintiff's request and, like the trial court, ruled that there was insufficient evidence to prove that the surgeon was vicariously liable for the injuries allegedly caused by the anesthetist.8

The plaintiff appealed to the NC Supreme Court which, in Harris v. Miller (1994), explicitly overruled the Jackson, Starnes, and "captain-of-the-ship" doctrines. The Supreme Court reshaped state law regarding the vicarious liability of surgeons and physicians by holding, in Harris, that for purposes of liability "surgeons should no longer be presumed to enjoy the authoritative control of a master over all who assist merely because they are 'in charge' of the operation." This represents implicit and explicit recognition that the surgeon is "no longer the only expert in the operating room."2 Despite rejecting previous forms of vicarious liability, the Supreme Court nevertheless reversed both the trial judge's and the court of appeals' rulings in favor of the defendant surgeon. In doing so, Harris allows plaintiffs to attempt to hold physicians liable for the acts of other health professionals even where the physicians are not themselves negligent and where there is no allegation that they were aware that negligent conduct was occurring.

Instead of a "captain-of-the-ship" doctrine, the Supreme Court declared that a surgeon or physician's liability for the actions of affiliated health professionals should be evaluated according to traditional agency law under the "borrowed servant" doctrine. This rule holds that an individual may be held vicariously liable for the negligence of a second individual if the former person has the "right" to control the latter's work and the "manner of performing it...irrespective of if he actually exercises that control or not." Applied to medical contexts, the doctrine means that a health professional may have become a "borrowed servant" of the attending physician when the attending has the right to control the other professional's work and manner of doing that work, even if the physician does not exercise the right.

The Harris Court did not provide a precise guide for future cases by describing the exact conditions under which a surgeon or physician would be deemed to have a right to control the actions of other health professionals. Instead, the Court ruled that the evidence in the case of Harris v. Miller was sufficient to allow a jury to decide whether the surgeon had the right to control the manner and details of the nurse anesthetist's work. The evidence may not ultimately convince a jury that the surgeon had such a right, but it indicates the type of cases that will be submitted to juries rather than being dismissed by trial court judges before trial. Moreover, it suggests that the Supreme Court will affirm jury decisions in favor of the existence of "borrowed servant" relationships when they are based on appropriate evidence.

The Harris court outlined the evidence that tended to demonstrate that the surgeon enjoyed a right to control the anesthetist:

1. The surgeon agreed with the hospital that he had the responsibility to control the performance of the nurse anesthetist. Such an agreement, the court reasoned, could be deduced from the hospital anesthesia manual, with whose provisions the surgeon agreed to comply as a condition of staff privileges. Specifically, the anesthesia manual stipulated that: "Anesthesia care shall be provided by nurse anesthetists working under the responsibility and supervision of the Surgeon doing the case.... Administration of anesthesia shall be the sole responsibility of the Surgeon and anesthetist involved, and it shall be their responsibility to select and administer a proper agent with proper techniques."

The fact that the hospital provided no anesthesiologist to supervise the anesthetist undoubtedly influenced and elevated the court's view of the surgeon's importance and duty.

- 2. An expert witness testified that in an emergency a surgeon has the right to control the anesthetist's every act.
- 3. Expert testimony regarding prevailing standards of practice and the surgeon-anesthetist relationship suggested that the former has right to control the latter's actions.
- 4. The surgeon at one point did exercise control over the anesthetist during the surgical procedure.²

Taken together, the Harris court reasoned that such evidence was sufficient to allow a jury to decide whether the surgeon possessed the "right" to control the anesthetist's work and whether a "borrowed servant" relationship existed. Consequently, both the trial court and the court of appeals had erred in not allowing the jury to decide the issue.

After Harris, What?

A North Carolina physician may be financially liable for the negligent acts of another health professional if:

- ✓ the physician is the employer of the health professional;
- the physician has a partnership relationship with the other health professional;
- the physician has the right to control the other health professional's work and the manner of doing it—that is, the other health professional is the "borrowed servant" of the surgeon or physician.

As mentioned earlier, an allegation of negligent supervision represents a different form of liability since it is based on a purported negligence in monitoring other health professionals.

Harris should not invoke widespread alarm. It is beneficial to have a ruling that completely and clearly abrogates the "captain-of-the-ship" doctrine. Moreover, the ruling does not guarantee that juries will invariably find that Harris-type evidence sufficiently demonstrates the "right" of lead physicians to control other health professionals' work and their manner of doing it, thereby imputing liability.

From a doctrinal standpoint, the ruling's reliance on the "borrowed servant" doctrine is consistent with interpretations of the law emerging in other jurisdictions. Few rely any longer on the all but moribund "captain-of-the-ship" doctrine. Some states have abolished the doctrine but devised other means of holding lead physicians liable (for example, because of failure to supervise or to carry out non-delegable duties to provide good care). A few state courts have held explicitly that physicians cannot control independent health professionals and therefore are not liable for their actions. However, many jurisdictions have taken a position (similar to Harris) that an attending physician's liability turns on whether the physician had the right to control a nurse's, technician's, anesthetist's, or even other physician's activities.

Is Harris a Workable Standard?

Despite the fact that Harris relies on the well-settled agency doctrine of the "borrowed servant" and that it is consonant with rulings from other jurisdictions, the practical and policy implications of the decision are troublesome. The central difficulty with Harris is that it creates no clear guidelines under which physicians may work with other health professionals. The determination of whether the lead physician has the "right" to control the actions of fellow health professionals is to be fact-based, which means that it will vary from case to case and institution to institution. The ultimate decision will be left to individual juries. There is simply no bright line rule designating when a health professional becomes a "borrowed servant" of an attending surgeon or physician. Admittedly, some of the uncertainty regarding the application of the doctrine may abate as case law on the topic accumulates and provides more judicial guidance.

In addition, given Harris, physicians and surgeons may be tempted to search out evidence that will inadvertently subject them to unexpected vicarious liability. As Harris suggested, such evidence may exist on the pages of policy and procedure manuals, medical staff bylaws, informed consent forms, and contractual agreements, as well as in institutional practice patterns, custom, and practice guidelines. Concern about potential liability is especially understandable when the delivery of medical services are, as in Harris, provided by non-physicians, which may enhance the lead physician's responsibilities.

Potential evidence of a right-to-control other health professionals may be difficult to uncover and identify in advance because it may be tucked away in various and disparate hospital documents. In addition, the interests of physicians and the institutions within which they work may run at cross purposes. If a hospital employee such as a nurse anesthetist is deemed the "borrowed servant" of the attending physician, then the hospital may be immune from liability emanating from its status as employer. These institutional considerations may impede the task of uncovering and reforming hospital policies that might provide evidence of physicians' rights to control the work of other health professionals. In addition, purging policy and procedure manuals of all potentially damaging phraseology may either be impractical or may undermine traditional perquisites of attending surgeons and physicians. Physicians and surgeons in fact desire and require some manner of authority over many of the health professionals with whom they work.

Physicians and surgeons who fear liability under the "borrowed servant" doctrine may want to participate fully and carefully in the selection and supervision of the health professionals with whom they work. This approach, too, may prove inappropriate, impractical, and ineffective. Lead physicians may not possess sufficient expertise to fulfill this role and an attempt to do so may even jeopardize patients by distracting the physicians from their own demanding responsibilities. Moreover, attempts to exercise supervision may infringe upon the legitimate prerogatives of other health professionals or of the health care institution itself. Finally, this approach perversely solves the problem of uncertain liability by virtually guaranteeing that the surgeon or physician will be found to have exercised control over the ancillary health professional's work.

Time For a Change?

The impracticability and inadvisability of applying generic "borrowed servant" doctrine to the relationships of attending surgeons or physicians to other health professionals suggests that it may be time to reconsider the wisdom of its use in the current medical environment. Courts originally adopted a broad view of attending physicians' vicarious liability in part to ensure that wrongly injured patients would receive damage awards. At the birth of the "captain-of-the-ship" doctrine in the 1950s, many hospitals enjoyed charitable immunity and were exempt from suit. At the same time, health professionals such as nurses carried little, if any, insurance coverage. Consequently, attending physicians (and their insurance underwriters) represented the only source from which negligently injured plaintiffs could be compensated.¹⁰

The medical environment has changed profoundly during the past 40 years. Many health professionals who were once deemed under the control of an attending physician or surgeon are now considered independent professionals. Most health professionals from nurses to technicians hold some form of insurance coverage. Many traditional forms of vicarious liability seem especially unfair and unwise when applied to attending surgeons and physicians who often do not possess the right to hire, fire, train, or assign the health professionals with whom they work. As a matter of institutional and professional reality, physicians sometimes have little practical control over nurses and other health professional staff. Physicians who fail to appropriately supervise health professionals who are under their direction, or who fail to intervene when they observe negligent behavior, can and should be held liable under negligence and negligent supervision doctrines. But neither the "captain-of-the-ship" nor the "borrowed servant" doctrines accurately match a late 20th-century medical environment that typically features numerous skilled, specialized, autonomous, and semi-autonomous professionals working beside and in concert with physicians and surgeons.

Sure... you're a good physician, but can you write?

Most physicians today need more than knowledge of medicine and good clinical ability to be successful. One of the tools you need is the ability to write well: to be able to put together a report of research that's worth publishing, to write a grant proposal that's fundable, to prepare a paper or exhibit for presentation that's well received.

We don't guarantee that you'll write a best seller or get a million-dollar grant, but we can guarantee that if you join us, you'll learn how to improve your writing, enhance the quality of your presentations, and keep up-to-date with developments in areas like desktop publishing.

We're an organization founded by physicians 50 years ago, and we're over 3000 strong. Among our members are people like you, for whom writing has become an increasingly important part of life. Find out more about us.

The number of patients awaiting organ transplantation has steadily escalated in recent years, but the donor pool has not changed (Fig. 1). As a result, thousands of patients with endstage organ disease die each year because there are no organs available for transplantation.^{1,2} The irony is that only 20%-25% of potential donors actually donate their organs. If we could increase the number so that just 50% of potential donors provided organs, current needs could be met. Potential organ donations are lost for a variety of reasons, the most common being the family's refusal to donate a loved one's organs following a tragic death. In this article we discuss some of the reasons why potential organ donors do not donate and possible solutions to this problem.

Why Isn't Everyone a Donor?

Most of us give little thought to death; consequently, most of us do not think about organ donation. Every four years in North Carolina one's license to drive an automobile expires. This creates a situation where, for a fleeting moment, people are asked to consider organ donation. Otherwise, thoughts of being an organ donor are suppressed to the depths of the subconsciousness along with thoughts of death and dying. We believe that it is inadequate to have such brief consideration of organ donation, especially when no information is given about how and why to become a donor. The ineffectiveness of this method of enlisting potential organ donors has been well documented.3,4 And even agreeing to be an organ donor and having "Yes" printed on the license does not ensure that organ donation will take place in the event of a sudden death. Organ retrieval is possible only if the immediate family agrees to it, even though the organ donor box on the driver's license is checked "Yes." In our society, where litigation is so common, no one would be willing to use organs against the family's wishes, even if that were the wish of the deceased. And since many people do not discuss their wishes with their families, thousands of potential organ donors are lost each year.

At present, except in the case of living-related kidney transplants, organs for transplantation are obtained in general only from patients who are brain dead. This is defined as the complete loss of all brain function with no chance of recovery whatsoever, and is a medically and legally accepted definition of death. But the concept of brain death is difficult for many lay people and even some doctors to understand—although the patient has died, the heart still beats and a ventilator makes the chest rise and fall. Brain death is a completely terminal event and is not synonymous with comatose. This fact must be emphasized.

The determination of brain death can be difficult for physicians, at times requiring confirmation of the diagnosis by a neurologist or neurosurgeon. There must be complete absence of all brain function, including that of the brain stem, and confounding factors such as the influence of drugs or hypothermia must be excluded. The process of declaring brain death can be time-consuming and confusing for the hospital staff as well as for the family members. In many cases, the possibility of organ donation is not given much thought amid the chaos and grieving; consequently, the curtain of death falls not only on the potential donor but on the possible organ recipients. Since about 25% of patients die while awaiting hearts or lungs or livers to become available, each loss of a potential donor means the life of someone waiting is kept in jeopardy as well.

The Role of a Caring Physician

Most physicians understand the need for organ donation, but many find it difficult to ask the family about organ donation during a time of tragedy. North Carolina law requires physicians to discuss with the family all opportunities for organ donation, but many times the possibility is not presented to the family in a way that they can understand. Families need time to come to grips with the death of a loved one, especially in the confusing situation of brain death rather than cessation of the heartbeat. If family members have not understood and accepted the death, they will certainly not be willing to donate organs. Families that refuse to donate organs usually do so because they are overwhelmed, confused, and have not been given enough time to deal with the fact of death.

It takes a considerable amount of the medical staff's time to help families get to the point where they can consider donation. Fortunately, organ procurement agencies have staff members available 24 hours a day to help them with their grief and to counsel them about organ donation.

When families are given enough time and are approached in a sensitive, compassionate manner, the percentage of those willing to donate organs has been shown to increase from less than 20% to 60%. Furthermore, when families have been helped to accept the death of their loved one and have been given adequate information about organ donation, they find it a great source of comfort that at least some good can come out of a tragic loss. Failure to spend enough time with families discussing the situation of brain death and organ donation in a caring manner results in the loss of thousands of potential donor organs each year and denies those grieving families a source of comfort.

What Can Doctors Do?

First, we must continue to educate all physicians. Physician awareness of the remarkable developments and successes in the field of organ transplantation is a key. The one-year survival rate of organ recipients is now 80% after heart transplantation, 75% after lung transplantation, 65% after liver transplantation, and greater than 95% after kidney or pancreas transplantation. Because of such success, organ transplantation has a well-defined role in the treatment of end-stage organ failure. Awareness of the successes of transplantation makes it easier to counsel families about donation. Thousands of lives can be saved.

Secondly, we must educate the public. Despite all efforts, tragedies will continue to occur. The only good that can come from a tragic death is the opportunity to be an organ donor and possibly save another person's life. Physicians should discuss organ donation with their patients and educate them on this issue. Organ procurement organizations such as the Carolina Organ Procurement Agency (COPA) devote a portion of their time to public and physician education. A coordinated educational effort by physicians and organ procurement agencies is essential. Thousands of lives can be saved.

Organ donation is a difficult issue to discuss, but discuss it we must. We have the technology to prolong lives ravaged by end-stage organ disease, but we are limited by the scarcity of transplantable organs. The shortage of donors could be alleviated by raising public awareness of this important issue. Thousands of lives can be saved.

Factors limiting successful organ transplantation are no longer technologic barriers. Science has lowered, if not eradicated those. Now we are limited largely by the number of organs available for transplantation. The number of patients awaiting transplantation continues to rise; the donor pool remains stagnant. Educating physicians and the general public about organ donation is the cornerstone to successful organ transplantation. Thousands of lives can be saved.

Radiologic Anatomy, CD-ROM
Gold Standard Multimedia In conjunction with the University of Florida, ISBN 1-885966-04-0, $195

Reviewed by Larry M. Crane, MD, FACR, Durham Radiology Associates, 2609 N. Duke St., Suite 303, Durham 27704

Radiologic Anatomy's interactive CD-ROM environment is designed to guide students of anatomy, physiology, and radiology through different aspects of fundamental anatomy using video displays of x-ray, CT, MRI, and fluoroscopic images in conjunction with anatomic dissections. The program requires Macintosh (System 7.0 or higher) or Windows (3.1 or higher) PC platforms with 4 MB RAM, 256 color capability, and a CD-ROM player. Setting it up was easy, but the program mysteriously asked whether I wanted the "full or custom" installation without documenting the advantages of either. I reviewed this product on a Pentium PC with Diamond Viper PCI video with 2 MB VRAM running at 1024 x 768 and 65K colors and a 2X CD-ROM player.

Radiologic Anatomy is the student version of another, similar program (not reviewed). It involves study by anatomic area or individual anatomic part, and users can self-test their skills at any point. It allows non-linear study since users can access any subject at random. The graphical interface is intuitive and requires only a few pages of documentation. When the user asks to look at an anatomic area or part, an x-ray or an alternative imaging modality is brought on screen along with handy screen "buttons" to "click" if radiographic film positioning, gross anatomy, or clinical correlation information is desired. Yellow arrows and accompanying text illustrate selected points of anatomy on the images. Some of the anatomy is supplemented by fluoroscopic video (mostly illustrating joint motion) displayed in two-inch screen boxes. All of this worked reasonably quickly on my system.

The quality of the images often left much to be desired, however. In the author's defense, I should note that digitizing analog x-ray films or anatomic photographs without significant image loss requires not only huge data files but, ideally, specialized and very expensive 2,000-line display monitors. To save storage space on the CD-ROM disk, the initial analog x-ray and photo images may have been digitized at lower resolution. And there is probably more information lost by use of compressed recording techniques to further decrease image file size. Getting these data files to the screen promptly requires a fast video card and an MPC-compliant CD-ROM drive. In trying to resolve these problems, Radiologic Anatomy had to make some hard choices between image quality and speed. It chose the latter, no doubt because of a desire to keep the pace of the program acceptable and compatible with ordinary video monitors. This results in "the jaggies"—the imprecise block edging often seen in computer graphics—and x-ray images that often appear blurred and unfocused. Photographic images of pathologic and clinical material suffer in the same way.

Even the quality of many of the images from primary digital formats suffer from the video compression and acquisition process. Varying levels of improper image contrast—usually too much—caused these pictures to lose significant amounts of information. I was surprised by the below-average quality of the CT and MRI images because these are primary digital format images. They should look reasonably sharp on most computer monitors, even after digital compression. In several instances, contiguous slices of the same CT scan varied widely in contrast.

In discussing computer-aided teaching media, some authors make a distinction between the high spatial and density resolution necessary for diagnostic x-ray images and those used for teaching images. They argue that teaching media place more limited demands on resolution. In some cases they're right, especially regarding material with original digital format (CT, MRI) or analog material intended only to make gross points of anatomy. Maybe this explains the quality of the images in Radiologic Anatomy.

The content of Radiologic Anatomy is somewhat limited, especially for medical students. Illustrative images of selected anatomic areas were often sparse. The program uses no ultrasound or nuclear medicine images to demonstrate anatomy. This is surprising since they are the imaging methods of choice for some anatomy. Mammography was relegated to the "clinical correlation" section of the chest, and xeromammography was listed as a viable modality, but ultrasound was not. One sees an occasional error. On one plain film, for instance, arrows identify the hepatic flexure of the colon as the right kidney. Despite a few lapses, however, the information provided was usually accurate.

The program's marketers claim that half of the nation's medical schools already use this CD-ROM, but I'm skeptical about its lasting utility for medical and health care students beyond its novelty value. The product packaging contains an endorsement from an unnamed Wake Forest University librarian, who states that "students who see the program love it." Since product offerings of this type in radiology are sparse, Radiologic Anatomy does indeed engender an initial "gee whiz" response, but serious users will notice its shortcomings.

Students of radiology technology should like this program when they are learning anatomy early in their training, but their lack of experience in various imaging modalities will keep them from using the alternative imaging formats adequately. The poor-quality illustrative materials also may confuse them. The program's digital video movies on proper patient positioning for x-rays are informative, however. High school students should also find the material interesting.

Computers have an advantage over print media because they can provide students with immediate feedback, whether through non-linear searches of information, images that convey sound or motion, or self-testing. Radiology Anatomy performed very well in these three areas. Navigating through the materials was intuitive, preventing aimless browsing yet still allowing tangential inquiry.

CD-ROM digital disks have a capacity of 650 MB (equivalent to about eight linear feet of books and journals), making them an ideal medium for storing graphically rich data. Radiology Anatomy comprises only about 266 MB, so the authors have plenty of space in which to store improved images in future upgrades. I do hope they will pay special attention to better resolution and to contrast control in the digitizing process. With improved images and additional text, Radiologic Anatomy might be worth its $195 suggested retail price ($99 for students, $495 for radiology practices, and $1,000 for institutions, a price that includes some CME credits). I consider it a good start and look forward to future program improvements.

Exercise Handouts for Rehabilitation is an excellent loose-leaf handbook of rehabilitation for physical therapists, exercise physiologists, rehabilitation medicine physicians, and athletic trainers. It provides the health care professional with a well-planned outline of exercises covering each part of the body. The authors "believe that exercise is truly the key to improving the physical condition of all types of patients." With that in mind, they have compiled groups of stretching and strengthening exercises. A description and diagram of each exercise is presented along with short- and long-term goals. The statement of goals is a key part of reimbursement mechanisms these days. The authors encourage the therapist to document goals.

Home exercise programs are an integral part of a rehabilitation plan. Patients will perform their home program only if the exercises are presented clearly. This is facilitated by a wellwritten and well-drawn exercise diagram for each joint and muscle group. The book may be faulted for failing to include an explanation of the various pathologic conditions that necessitate a rehabilitation program. What precisely is meant by the term "tennis elbow," for example? Also missing is a list of common substitutions made by patients when they are unable to complete an exercise. Recent physical therapy graduates, not yet familiar with methods used by some patients to mask their restricted movement patterns, would thus be alerted to these substitutions.

The drawings are clear and easy to understand. Most importantly, the starting/ending positions are drawn to enable the patient to see the entire range of motion through which a "normal" muscle will pass.

I particularly liked the section in the back of the notebook devoted to ergonomics. The frequency of worksite-related injuries today proves that posture and habits on the job have a great impact on muscle problems.

"Lung Cancer"

Clinical limericks by Victor F. Tapson, MD, Assistant Professor of Medicine, Duke Division of Pulmonary and Critical Care Medicine, Box 31175, DUMC, Durham, 27710

I. Syndromes and Cell Types

The lung tumor named for Pancoast, Is up in the lung's uppermost. It made Horner famous, And it's usually squamous, If you smoke you're a more likely host.*

Horner said if your eye gets miosis, And half of your face anhidrosis. This insightful eye doc— Ophthalmologic Sherlock— Said, it's likely you'll also have ptosis.

Squamous cell may cavitate, Or cause a lobe to deflate. With a calcium climb, It's squamous cell time, Time to cut or perhaps radiate.

Small cell may start metastatic, To the brain or the bone or hepatic. Submucosal location, Less cell exudation, It usually isn't phlegmatic.[†] The small cell name's a misnomer. It's a free-wheelin' whole body roamer. The cells may be small, But they spread and they sprawl, A mitotic grand slam of a homer.

Instead of small, why not "quick?"
At least for this limerick.
Because maybe the small,
Means you've no time at all,
A difficult tumor to lick.

Whether small cell or large or between, The frustrating Lung Cancer Machine. Chemo cut buzz, It still does what it does, Laughing as we intervene.

- * This line originally read "And sooner or later you're toast," but this sounded a bit too cynical.
- [†] 1. Of or relating to phlegm. 2. Having or suggesting a calm, sluggish temperament; unemotional.
- I originally said "Before your bucket is kicked," but this also sounded cynical.

II. Therapeutic Strategies with a Focus on Newer Chemotherapy Regimens

If you've got a Stage I, cut it out.
Then celebrate, scream, and shout.
You can plan in advance,
You've got a 50% chance,
Of being up and about (at five years).

The group called CALGB, Tried initial short-course XRT. They then gave chemo, With chests still aglow, Their patients were more disease-free.²

ICE chemo can make an impression, Halting non-small cell progression. Cisplat 'fosfamide, And Etoposide, IL-6 prevents platelet regression.³ A guy named LeChevalier,⁴ Agrees chemo will be the way,
To lengthen your life,
If you can't get the knife,
Navelbine and cisplat s'il yous plait.

When this plant they call navelbine, Arrived on the lung cancer scene. Encouraging trials, Said it's better by miles,⁵ Than supportive care and codeine.

We can offer a new drug called Taxol, From a plant, so it's "au natural." It's the sap from a tree, (Thus, from Yew and from me...) Neuropathy occurs, I recall.

Can we stop the Lung Cancer Machine? Maybe so, using gemcitabine. 10-EDAM, taxotere, On the cancer frontier, CPT-11 and fotemustine.⁶

CPT-11 may be out anytime, It shuts down a nuclear enzyme. Topoisomerase I, Is suppressed when it's done, The long name for this drug⁷ is a crime.

Dillman used chemo⁸ induction, To increase non-small cell destruction. Those with stage III, Then got XRT, A lung cancer survival instruction.⁹

Navelbine is here to stay, To destroy your non-small cell CA. The one imperfection, Is painful injection, But you'll rarely require a toupée.

Lung cancer is tough to destroy In spite of the treatment employed. Although multimodality, May help mortality, It should include things you enjoy.

AT LEAST ONE-THIRD OF ALL BREAST CANCER PATIENTS COULD HAVE LUMPECTOMY FOLLOWED BY RADIATION THERAPY

The American Cancer Society, the American College of Surgeons and the American College of Radiology have agreed that women whose early breast cancer was detected by mammography are candidates for breast-saving treatment. According to new standards, women with small lumps, those with tumors as large as two inches, and even some women with positive nodes may be candidates for this treatment.

Stage for stage, patients treated in this manner have the same longevity and the same freedom from local recurrence as those treated with mastectomy.

"Thoughts on Work"

Hard work never killed anybody, but worrying about it did.

—Anonymous

Most people are too busy earning a living to make any money.

—Anonymous

The only person who had his work done by Friday was Robinson Crusoe.

—Anonymous

Abolish work tomorrow and the mental hospitals would be full in a month.

A Commitment to Change. A Commitment to You.

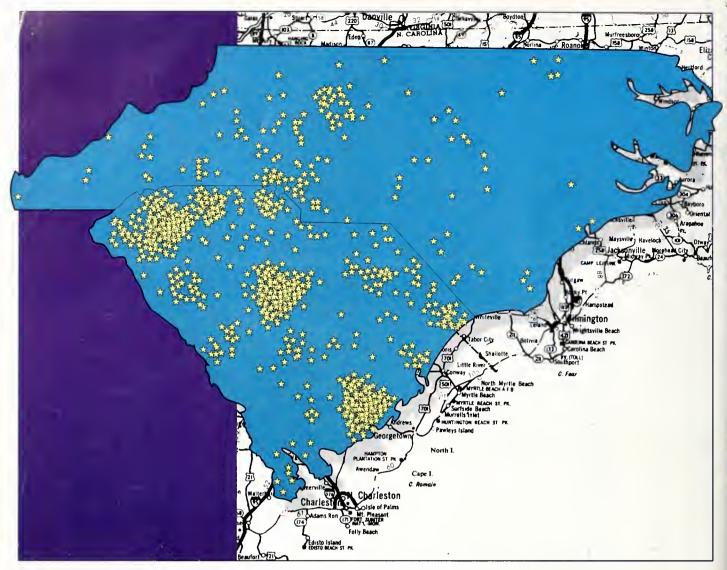

The physicians of North Carolina planted the seeds of change in 1975 when they formed Medical Mutual Insurance Company. For 19 years, health-care providers in the Tar Heel state have been reaping the benefits of their physician-owned and operated company. At Medical Mutual, we're committed to change.

We're committed to you.

What can a map tell you about a computer system?

Plenty—if, like this one, it shows how many medical offices in the Carolinas use a particular practice management system to run more efficiently, effectively, and profitably.

For example, it might show how a 16-year commitment to "Working for Physicians" has resulted in over 800 installations in North and South Carolina.

It might bring home how features like "on-the-fly" refiling, encounterform tracking, and direct transmission to North Carolina Medicare,
Medicaid, and Blue Cross/Blue Shield (with no per-claim charges) are improving physicians' revenue.

It could clarify how critical "one-call" support can be in helping offices stay productive — how telephone support staff, software and hardware engineers, technicians, trainers, and a fleet of service vans can provide support unmatched in the industry.

It might demonstrate how ongoing research and development brought innovations like the first integrated, direct electronic claims transmission in a practice management system.

Or it could validate the concept of regional focus: By selling systems only in the Southeast, a computer company can keep customers up-to-date on the latest insurance filing requirements.

It could emphasize the flexibility of multi-user, multi-tasking software that runs on the most popular operating system in the world.

And it could illustrate the value of having a computer vendor with a vision for the future and the expertise to make that vision work for you.

HIGH-TECH FOR HIGH POTENTIAL

T. Rowe Price Science & Technology Fund invests in the companies behind today's breakthrough products, including those in the telecommunications, biotechnology, pollution control, and computer industries. As their products, processes, and techniques gain wider acceptance, these companies often enjoy exceptional growth—offering significant capital appreciation potential for investors.

Broadly diversified to add stability. The fund invests broadly across industry sectors and markets. And, it has the latitude to choose companies ranging in size from the Fortune 500 to today's smaller emerging growth companies—depending on where fund managers find the greatest potential. To select companies with the most promise, each is carefully evaluated based on both its financial strength and its products.

Ranked #1 by Lipper and rated 5 stars by Morningstar.

This fund has been successful to date at identifying dynamic opportunities. It is ranked #1 out of 15 science and technology funds since the fund's inception (9/30/87) through 12/31/94, according to the Lipper Science and Technology Fund Category. In addition, the fund was awarded a five-star ($\star\star\star\star\star$) rating for its overall risk-adjusted performance by Morningstar. The fund's performance was rated in the top 10% among 1,155 and 878 equity funds for the combined three- and five-year periods ended 2/28/95, respectively. Of course, the risks of investing in this field are commensurate with its rewards. DNR Q&A

To the Editor:

I am requesting permission from the Journal to photocopy the February "Health Watch" section "Dying at Home: A Review of the Do-Not-Resuscitate Process" (NC Med J 1995;56:97-100). This very concise, straightforward article explains to patients and their families the purpose of the prehospital DNR form and how the procedure is implemented.

As assistant medical director for the Forsyth County EMS and medical director for Region I, EMS Council, I am very often asked to address the issue of prehospital DNR, both by physicians as well as families of patients. I think that this article will go a long way in answering individuals' questions.

Roy L. Alson, PhD, MD, FACEP Assistant Professor Department of Emergency Medicine Bowman Gray School of Medicine Medical Center Boulevard Winston-Salem, NC 27157-1089

From the Editor:

We were pleased to grant Dr. Alson permission to photocopy the February "Health Watch," and hope that the information is useful to both his colleagues and his patients.

Public Health Matters To the Editor:

We, in the public health family, have been aware of the dangers of tobacco use for many years. We were especially pleased to see the January 1995 special issue of the Journal that addressed this problem. The NC Public Health Association applauds your courage and fully supports your position on this important public health issue. Keep up the good work and let us know if we can be of any assistance to you in the future.

DEWEESISLAND

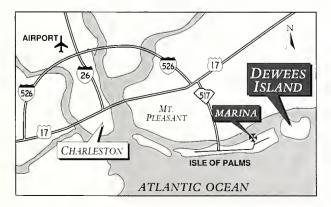

An Oceanfront Retreat to Call Your Own... Minutes from Historic Charleston and the International Airport

Located only a nine-minute ferry ride north of the Isle of Palms lies one of the South's last barrier islands available for development and the Charleston area's only private island.

Unlike other islands, there are no restaurants, lounges, or golf courses for outsiders to visit, while invading the privacy of homeowners. The only visitors on Dewees are guests of property owners.

This boat-access island is unique in other ways... a clean, wide beach stretches for over $2^{1}/_{2}$ miles, development plans carefully protect the island's natural environment, transportation is restricted to electric vehicles, and a property owner's ferry runs on schedule. In addition, environmental covenants limit the number of homes to only 150.

The location of the island is extraordinary...its pristine surroundings are perfect for fresh & saltwater fishing, crabbing, shrimping, and oystering, yet it's just minutes to downtown Charleston and the International Airport.

Come explore Dewees, truly a private island to call your own. Prices start at $165,000, with two-acre oceanfront lots starting at $315,000.

Call 1-800-444-7352 or (803) 886-8783.

Protecting Workers and Their Families in North Carolina

Ricky Langley, MD, MPH

Why a special issue on occupational health in North Carolina? Among many reasons we might include: 1) a lack of training of physicians in occupational medicine; 2) the frequent failure of doctors to recognize occupational illness; 3) the misdiagnosis of occupational illness (for example, carpal tunnel syndrome); 4) the failure to recognize that everyone—from fetus to the retiree—is potentially exposed to workplace toxins.

Unfortunately, a patient's occupational history is often neglected or only superficially covered during medical examinations. This may be partially explained by the fact that most students receive only four to five hours of training in occupational medicine during medical school. ¹² Sadly, this situation does not seem to be improving despite the fact that thousands of workers are killed on the job and hundreds of workers die from work-related illnesses each year.³ Approximately 10% of all caneer may be occupational in origin.⁴ There are more than five million known chemicals but we have only minimal toxicologic information on most, especially their effects on unborn children or the effects of chronic, low-level exposure or the effects from mixed chemical exposures.

All physicians, regardless of specialty, should inquire about potential exposure to workplace hazards. Numerous cases have been documented of workers who have unwittingly exposed spouses, parents, or children to lead, asbestos, or pesticides carried on contaminated work clothing.⁵ It is important for physicians to determine whether their patients are exposed and recommend appropriate actions to prevent illness from occurring.

From an economic point of view, the ever-increasing cost of workers' compensation makes it imperative that physicians be familiar with their patient's workplace and job duties so that they can avoid misdiagnosing work-related illnesses that are not present. A perfect example is found in the overdiagnosis of cumulative trauma disorders. On the other hand, familiarity with the workplace may help the physician determine the cause of a patient's illness. Asthma may be due to isocyanate sensitization, not pollen. Therefore, all patients should be asked to briefly describe their actual job duties on a typical day and asked whether they have any health or safety concerns regarding their jobs. And do not forget about part-time jobs or hobbies that may involve chemical or physical hazards.

The costs of illnesses and injuries due to workplace exposure are staggering. Not only must the industry pay medical costs, but delays in production and delivery of goods and services adds a significant economic loss. Workers and their families may face significant medical expenses and long recovery periods or they may not be able to return to work at all, creating financial and emotional hardships. Each year in North Carolina almost eight out of every 100 full-time workers sustain a recordable injury or illness, and nearly half of those affected are either restricted from work activities or are out of work for one or more days.⁶ Proper identification of work-related illness means that patients benefit from early treatment, work restrictions when necessary, and appropriate compensation. And by instituting corrective measures, similar illness may be prevented in other workers.

Resources are available to help physicians identify possible work-related injuries or illnesses. The Occupational Health Section of the NC Department of Environment, Health and Natural Resources offers consultative services to physicians, health departments, and industry (919/733-3680). If a worker

Dr. Langley, guest editor of this special issue, is Assistant Clinical Professor in the Division of Occupational and Environmental Medicine, Box 2914, Duke University Medical Center, Durham 27710.

"Proper identification of work-related illness means that patients benefit from early treatment, work restrictions when necessary,

gives his or her permission, a physician may request the NC Occupational Safety and Health Administration inspect the worksite. Staff at Duke's Division of Occupational and Environmental Medicine can assist with patient consultations and worksite evaluations (800/672-0066), as can Bowman Gray (910/716-9998), East Carolina University (919/816-2070), and UNC-Chapel Hill (919/966-2491). A few private firms and physicians in the state can assist with patient consultations and site visits as well. The Yellow Pages lists most of them in the "physician/surgeon" section under "occupational medicine." An additional resource is the American College of Occupational and Environmental Medicine, 55 W. Seegers Road, Arlington Heights, IL 60005 (708/228-6850).

For this special issue of the Journal on occupational health and safety hazards, I have focused on several industries that employ large populations of workers in North Carolina. The agricultural industry was previously described in a special issue of the Journal published in October 1993. The following industries are covered in this issue: chemical and pharmaceutical, electronics, rubber, furniture, textile, and health care.

As evidenced by recent shootings at plants in Research Triangle Park and the Hamlet chicken-processing factory fire, mental stress is a growing concern of occupational medicine. Many industries have developed employee assistance programs to help employees cope with work and family stress and substance abuse. Therefore, one article is devoted to the various mental health issues in today's changing workforce.

As more physicians work with local industries, legal concerns must be considered since they serve as a contractor for a business. Included is an article on occupational liability issues important to physicians providing services to industry.

I hope this special issue of the Journal will increase the awareness of all health professionals about the potential harmful exposures that occur at patients' worksites. I want to encourage physicians to visit local companies and develop positive relationships with the health and safety officers there. In the end, it is our patients who benefit from a knowledgeable physician and a safe worksite.

It's Off to Work We Go

by Francis A. Neelon, MD, Editor

"Work," William Osler said, is "the Master Word in Medicine." And it is! The salvation of my uncleverness, antidote for my leaky memory, balm for my stupidity. I find it hard to imagine a world without the joys (and tribulations) of work. Once, I asked Mortimer Adler, who was still working 60-hour weeks in his late 80s, what he thought of "workaholism." He cited, as usual, Aristotle, who distinguished "leisure"—work you would still do even if you won the lottery tomorrow—from "toil"—work you would never do if you could afford not to. He then defined workaholism as immersion in toil (sometimes, leisure) in order to escape other responsibilities. The number of hours worked didn't matter as long as you had your priorities straight.

Now, reading this special issue of the Journal, I realize how little thought I have given to the direct health consequences of working. I suspect the same is true for most doctors. Dr. Langley's team of expert authors touch on the health risks in North Carolina's major industries (except farming, which we covered earlier). I was struck by how often the themes of occupational illness recur: inhaled allergens and irritants cause asthma; skin exposure to solvents and other agents causes allergic or irritant dermatitis; repetitive motion induces neuromuscular damage such as tendinitis or carpal tunnel syndrome (but beware of a facile diagnosis); medical jobs carry the risk of exposure to infection; radioisotopes and a few other chemicals, the risk of cancer. Putting people in confined quarters for long periods of time increases the risks of mental breakdown, stress, and violence. The list in its broad outlines is not long, but it is clearly important for any physician whose patients go to work every day.

I was also struck by how hard industries have worked (or been required to work) to lessen workplace health risks. Protective clothing and gloves (themselves sometimes the cause of latex allergy), minimization of exposure, testing of sensitive workers, changing of jobs—all lessen the ill-effects of working. The workplace is not devoid of risk, but it is safer than it might be.

Reading this Journal will make the doctor's work less onerous the next time a patient complains of breathlessness on Monday morning or numbness and tingling in the hand that squeezes out thousands of pricing labels a day. But there is only one way to be prepared to make the diagnosis—and Osler knew it. Work!

Instructions for Authors

The North Carolina Medical Journal is a medium for communication with and by members of the medical community of this state. The Journal will consider for publication articles relating to and illuminating medical science, practice, and history; editorials and opinion pieces; letters; personal accounts; poetry and whimsical musings; and photographs and drawings. Papers that relate to the present, past, or future practice of the health professions in North Carolina are especially pertinent, but manuscripts reflecting other perspectives or topics are welcomed. Prospective authors should feel free to discuss potential articles with the editors.

Manuscript Preparation

Prepare papers according to the "Uniform Requirements for Manuscripts Submitted to Biomedical Journals" (N Engl J Med 1991;324:424-8) with the following exceptions: 1) no abstract is needed; 2) no running title is needed; and 3) report measurements in metric units; use of the International System of Units (SI) is optional.

Submit a cover letter and either a 3 1/2-inch hard disk or 5 1/4-inch floppy computer disk that contains the text written in MS DOS- or Macintosh-compatible format, and at least one hard copy of the text. Double space text with one-inch margins. Please do not "format" the text (e.g. no variations in type size, no bold face, no italics, no embedded endnotes).

Submit illustrations, in duplicate, in the form of highquality color 35mm slides or 5-by-7-inch or 8-by-10-inch glossy photographs, or as black-and-white glossy prints (5by-7-inch or 8-by-10-inch). Label all illustrations with author's name, number them sequentially according to their position in the text, and indicate the orientation of the images, if necessary. Do not write directly on the backs of prints. This can damage them. If figures require printing in four-color process, the author may be asked to pay printing fees or a portion thereof.

Type figure legends, double-spaced, on a separate sheet of paper. Tables should be typed, double-spaced, one to a single sheet of paper. All tables must have titles and consecutive Arabic numbers. Include tables, graphs, or charts on disk, if possible.

Keep references to a minimum (no more than 15, preferably 10 or fewer), retaining those that document important points. The "Uniform Requirements" cited above contain the format for references. Authors are responsible for the accuracy and pertinence of all citations.

Avoid abbreviations entirely if possible; keep them to a minimum if not. When used, completely define abbreviations at the first point of usage in the text.

Manuscript Review and Editing

A medically qualified editor reads all manuscripts and, in most instances, sends them out for further review by one or more other members of the North Carolina Medical Society. Authors' cover letters must include a line that states that their submitted manuscripts are not under consideration for publication elsewhere. Decisions to publish or not are made by the editors, advised by the peer reviewers.

We encourage a relatively informal writing style since we believe this improves communication. Imagine yourself talking with your unseen audience—as long as this doesn't lead you to scientific or linguistic inaccuracy. Be brief, clear, simple, and precise.

We edit accepted manuscripts for clarity, style, and conciseness. Except for letters, authors receive a copy of the edited manuscript for their review and approval before publication. Manuscripts not accepted will not be returned.

Authors retain copyright to articles published in the North Carolina Medical Journal, but the North Carolina Medical Society copyrights the contents of each entire issue. Requests for permission to reprint all or any part of a published article must be submitted in writing to the address below and negotiated with the author and editor jointly. Reprinted material must carry a credit line identifying that it appeared in the North Carolina Medical Journal.

Because Decisions Are Made Here...

Right now, key decisions are being made about health care reform on Capitol Hill...decisions that will directly affect you. Regardless of where you stand on the issue, one thing is certain...reform legislation will hit home with patients and health care professionals alike. Will you be ready to respond?

You Can Make A Difference Here.

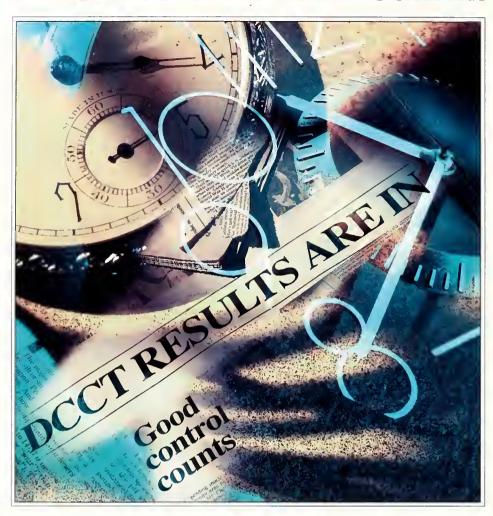

Thousands of physicians and patients are taking advantage of one clinical resource that is sure to prosper under any health care reform package. Home health care is a cost-effective alternative to traditional treatment modalities. It affords the one benefit essential to any successful reform bill: the ability to control medical costs without compromising quality of care.

To seek a career in home health care, call First American Home Care, formerly ABC Home Health Services, Inc. The nation's largest, privately-owned, Medicare-certified home health care provider, First American can show you the many advantages of providing health care in the home. Call us at 1-800-WORK-222, ext. 5004, day or night, for more information. We promote a drug-free workplace. Equal Opportunity Employer M/F/D/V.

Occupational Hazards in the Hospital, Doctor's Office, and Other Health Care Facilities

Linda M. Frazier, MD, MPH, Wayne R. Thomann, DrPH, and George W. Jackson, MD

Why should one learn about occupational health issues in health care facilities? Because those who work there may be exposed to occupational health hazards; physicians need to be informed about those risks. For example, most physicians are aware that health risks are associated with radiation exposure. And the human immunodeficiency virus epidemic has increased the profession's awareness risks of on-the-job infections. In fact, it was partly in response to this epidemic that the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) issued the Bloodborne Pathogens Standard.

So doctors are aware of some workplace risks, but if we mention chemical exposure, heavy industrial settings such as smelting or chemical manufacturing come to mind rather than health care facilities. Nevertheless, the agents used to sterilize medical instruments are hazardouschemicals. Or if we consider ergonomic risks, we may think of poultry processing plants or textile mills, but nurses have one of the highest rates of back injury anywhere. Hospital employees often request back belts because they must do a great deal of lifting. Is this a good idea?

During undergraduate and medical school, teachers sometimes model a risktaking ethic-they don't wear gloves, they pour out benzene on the bench instead of in a hood, they anesthetize experimental animals without exhaust ventilation. Who can forget the blood splashed on the medical student's face during surgery or the formaldehyde vapors of the gross anatomy lab? Fortunately, safety standards are higher now. Research documenting the risks of cancer or adverse reproductive outcomes has mandated a more cautious approach to chemical exposure than before. We summarize in this paper the occupational exposures most likely to occur in medical care facilities. All of them can be controlled by following basic safety principles.

"Working With" Is Not the Same as Being "Exposed To" an Agent

People often use the term "exposed" to mean that they work with an agent or that it is used in their workplace. In order to create exposure, the material in question must be deposited on the skin or taken into the body. By controlling routes of exposure, people can "work with" toxic agents without being "exposed."

Exposure to workplace chemicals occurs by:

I) Inhalation. This is not an issue when a chemical agent is used in a wellfunctioning chemical fume hood, or when an agent is used with an appropriate respirator, or when an agent has a very low vapor pressure. The presence of the smell (or no smell) of a substance is not a good index of exposure because the odor threshold of some agents is much lower than the toxic inhalation dose (for example, diesel fumes). If one is worried about potential health hazards of agents being used, environmental monitoring may be necessary to determine how much of the substance is present and whether significant amounts could be inhaled.

Air currents can sometimes cause fine chemical powders to become airborne. Toxic powders should always be mixed or weighed in a hood or with the operator using another form of respiratory protection such as a dust-mist mask.

2) Transdermal absorption. Absorption of chemicals through the skin can be prevented by using gloves and protective clothing such as a lab coat. Latex or vinyl gloves are satisfactory for many agents, but some, such as dimethylsulfoxide (DMSO), pass through latex or vinyl gloves so special gloves (for example, nitrile gloves) are needed. Safety and industrial hygiene books list the types of gloves needed for specific chemicals.

3) Ingestion. Alimentary exposure usually occurs when a chemical gets on the hands after which workers either touch their mouths or eat without washing their hands. Food, drink, and eigarettes kept in the work area can absorb chemical fumes or be contaminated with dusts, leading to ingestional exposure.

Types of Potential Exposure

Table 1 lists the major potential exposure risks of health care workers by area of service. Table 2 summarizes potential health effects of commonly used chemicals. Small health care facilities—e.g., a doctor's office—may use only a few of the agents, but the health issues and exposure control methods needed there are the same as in larger facilities.¹⁻¹¹

Risky chemicals. To ensure that health care personnel do not have excessive exposure to volatile chemicals, the exposure control methods listed in Table 3. pages 192-3, should be followed and the air sampled periodically. Waste anesthetic gases pose a problem in older operating rooms with suboptimal ventilation systems. Pediatric cases may produce the greatest exposure because anesthetic masks may not fit patients well. Modern anesthesia equipment often uses a scavenging system to recover waste gases. Adhesives such as methyl methacrylate used during orthopedic procedures require adequate ventilation and should be used only in operating rooms equipped to exhaust waste anesthetic gases. As with other chemicals, air monitoring can de-

Asbestos may be present in building materials used to construct older health care facilities. Standard asbestos abatement procedures will protect employees when asbestos is disturbed during renovations.

Antineoplastic drugs should be mixed in a chemical fume hood using gloves and protective clothing. After being mixed they can be administered without significant occupational exposure by nursing staff who use gloves and follow hand washing and other protocols.¹²

Chemical disinfectants and "cold sterilants" such as 2% alkaline glutaraldehyde are potent irritants. They can provoke reactive airway symptoms in some individuals. Highest exposures occur when concentrated solutions are being diluted, when disinfectant baths are left uncovered, or when the agents are used in poorly ventilated areas. Workers must be cautioned never to mix ammonia-based cleaning agents with bleach-based agents: chlorine gas is liberated and is highly irritating to mucous membranes. Large hospitals use ethylene oxide for sterilization. This is a highly toxic chemical, but sterilization chambers have many safety features. Exposures are more likely during maintenance of equipment, during transfer of materials in and out of the chamber, or during handling of sterilized products ("off-gassing").

Metallic mercury has a low vapor pressure, but it is so toxic at even low concentrations that a spill from a broken sphygmomanometer needs to be cleaned up using a special chemical treatment process. Otherwise mercury can remain in a carpet or in small cracks in a floor or work surface and produce elevated mercury levels in employees.

Significant quantities of solvents are used in hospitals but less often in smaller health care facilities. Histopathology laboratories use xylene (as well as formaldehyde and mutagenic tissue stains). Organic solvents are components of construction varnishes, stains, and some paints; they are sometimes used as carriers for pesticides used by groundskeepers.

Manufacturers are required to supply Material Safety Data sheets listing the ingredients of each of their products, as well as brief information on health effects of acute exposure. Employers are required to maintain a file of Material Safety Data sheets for use by employees working with the agent(s). This legal requirement applies not only to industry but also to hospitals, doctors' offices, and other medical facilities.

Physical agents. Radioisotopes can be inhaled, absorbed through the skin, or ingested. Inhalation is the primary route of radon exposure, but inhalation may occur when radio-labeled compounds are mechanically agitated, dispersing an aerosol or dust. Such procedures should be carried out in a hood. Radioisotopes can be ingested when good laboratory techniques are not followed.

Alpha-emitters such as tritium have a very limited ability to penetrate the body unless they are inhaled or ingested. Gamma emitters such as ³⁵S, ³²P or ¹²⁵I are more able to penetrate the body, but they are not commonly used in hospitals, and when they are, appropriate shielding will prevent direct-surface irradiation. Use of most radiation sources requires a license; both OSHA and NC regulations list safety procedures that must be followed.

In health care facilities, the most common potential source of radiation exposure is from x-rays, usually absorbed through body surfaces. The extremities are relatively radioresistant, and lead aprons and thyroid shields can effectively prevent irradiation of radio-sensitive parts of the body. Furthermore, modern x-ray equipment focuses the primary beam on the examination table, producing little secondary scatter radiation. Radiography suites should be set up so that patients (even infants and children) need not be held by an employee. Even during fluoroscopy, if properly adjusted equipment and lead shields are used, the dose to radiosensitive organs of workers is negligible. Nevertheless, surveillance of radiation exposure is required for specific employees. This can be accomplished using badges, including ring badges to measure the dose to the extremities.

Employees who work in areas where radiation is used and who become pregnant should report this so that an occupational review can be performed. It is important to ensure that the fetus is not exposed to more than 0.5 rem of radiation during the pregnancy and no more than 0.05 rem of fetal exposure during any one gestational month. For comparison, the ovarian radiation dose from a lumbosacral spine x-ray is 0.126 rem.²

Hearing protection and annual audiograms are indicated only for noisy jobs (such as equipment maintenance, engineering, or groundskeeping) which have an eight-hour, time-weighted average noise exposure of 85 decibels or more. Controlling heat exposure of laundry, maintenance, and grounds workers during the summer may require administrative controls such as limiting the duration of exposure. Fire and electrical hazards posed by medical equipment, flammable chemicals, or other sources can be addressed by regular inspection and maintenance, the availability of a correct fire extinguisher, and worker training.

Infectious and allergy-inducing agents. OSHA's bloodborne pathogens standard provides detailed guidelines to limit exposure. It requires that employers offer hepatitis B vaccine free of charge to potentially exposed workers, conduct safety training, provide personal protective equipment, and develop a protocol for handling parenteral and mucous membrane exposures.

In a similar vein, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention have issued guidelines to reduce the occupational transmission of tuberculosis. Their recommendations are not an OSHA standard, but OSHA can cite health care facilities that do not comply with them by using its general duty clause.¹³

Glove-induced dermatitis is a common problem in health care facilities. It is sometimes difficult to determine whether the problem represents allergy to latex, an occlusive dermatitis caused by the damp environment in the gloves, or an allergic or irritant phenomenon caused by sensitizers found in many hand lotions and soaps. A skin prick test can identify latex hypersensitivity, but there have been case reports of anaphylaxis during this procedure. A latex RAST (radioallergosorbent) test can determine whether IgE antibodies to latex are present.9 If they are, the employee should be provided non-latex gloves; if not, the employee may still have cell-mediated hypersensitivity to latex and require latex-free gloves. Thus, the diagnosis of latex sensitivity rests on clinical history and on trials of eliminating lotions and soaps, reducing moisture via cotton glove liners and the use of non-latex gloves (also see article by Moon and Powell on page 196).

Occupational asthma has been attributed to latex.¹⁰ Hospital employees who used latex gloves were surveyed and 13 of 287 subjects had positive reactions to skin prick tests with latex extracts. Five of the 13 reported asthma symptoms that worsened during or after work shifts;

12 of the 13 underwent a provocation challenge. They were asked to open glove bags and shake a pair of gloves while wearing vinyl gloves; on another day the same procedure was used but only vinyl gloves were manipulated. The FEV₁ of seven of the 12 fell (mean decrease compared to baseline of 32%) after shaking the latex gloves. Most likely latex antigens adherent to glove powder particles became airborne when gloves were manipulated and induced bronchospasm.

Ergonomic and mechanical problems. Of all the materials handled in health care facilities, the patient is the most fragile. Even a small adult weighs a lot compared to packages handled by the post office. Patients have no handles, they change shape as they are moved, and sometimes they grab you when they fear they will fall. In industry, packages as heavy as this would be moved with powered equipment, but in health care facilities people (often rather petite women) move the patients (Fig. 1, below). Because of the weight of adult patients, no use of "body mechanics" by the worker will make solo lifts of total care patients safe. Such patients must be moved using team lifts and lifting equipment. Back belts have not > been shown to reduce injuries, but they sometimes do more harm than good,¹¹ perhaps by providing false confidence to workers who then lift more than they should.

> Although much has been written in the press about arm and wrist injuries to computer users, there has been no strong evidence of tissue damage from the interrupted typing required in many computerized health care jobs. Carpal tunnel syndrome and tendinitis have only been firmly associated with very highly repetitive motions performed using substantial force (like cutting up 70 chickens per minute) and combined with other factors such as wrist angles of more than 45 degrees, very significant tool vibration or refrigerated workplace temperatures. That said, computer workstations can be made more comfortable by adjusting the keyboard, monitor, and seat height to maintain a neutral body posture and by scheduling typing tasks to incorporate hourly mini-breaks that use other muscle groups (also see "Eye On Ergonomics," NC Med J 1995;56:73-4).

Other exposures. Rotating work shifts, violence, drug addiction, and psychologic stress can be found in virtually all work environments, but these issues have recently received more attention among health care workers, and institutions have responded in various ways. Many health care facilities have increased their security measures to prevent assaults on workers. Some use critical incident debriefing to reduce the incidence of post-traumatic stress disorder among health care workers who are on duty when a disaster occurs, particularly the death of a child.7 Employee assistance programs furnish counselors who can provide rapid critical incident debriefing and assistance for other psychosocial problems (substance abuse, interpersonal relationships, and employee relations problems). (Also see article by Stenberg on page 228.)

Controlling "Exposure"

Employers are responsible for enforcing safety rules among their workers. In general, engineering controls are preferable to personal protective equipment or job rotation; adequate ventilation or use of a chemical fume hood is better than a respirator. Information about proper work practices, including use of gloves and eye protection when indicated, should be provided through employee education and safety training. For some exposures, additional safety measures (hepatitis B vaccination, periodic tuberculin testing) are needed. Needle sticks and certain other exposures must be investigated and suitable measures instituted to lessen future exposure. Surveillance every year or more often is indicated for employees who work with tuberculosis or in environments with noise over 85 decibels. Table 3 summarizes methods of exposure control applicable in health care settings.

Most large hospitals have access to an industrial hygienist or other trained professionals who can help design safety programs. Smaller health care facilities and doctor's offices can consult fee-forservice firms, OSHA, and sometimes the state health department for safety program advice.

Conclusion

Hospital administrators shouldn't buy back belts, but should invest funds and effort in developing an ergonomic program that emphasizes team lifts and use of lifting equipment. In the laboratory and pharmacy, volatile or finely powdered toxic substances should be manipulated only in a chemical fume hood. The concentration of formaldehyde in the gross anatomy lab can be checked by air monitoring to determine whether ventilation needs improving. Students can avoid serious exposure from blood splash to the face by wearing face protection.

Even more important than these examples is the fact that many agents in the health care environment pose health risks. We should respect these agents by developing action plans to control risks and work with safety or industrial hygiene professionals to ensure that procedures and personal protective equipment are satisfactory. A safe work environment allows health care workers to work without excess risk to their own health.

Occupational Health Issues in the Chemical and Pharmaceutical Industries

Samuel D. Moon, MD, MPH, and Gwendolyn S. Powell, MD, MPH

The research, development, and production activities of pharmaceutical and non-pharmaceutical chemical companies often involve toxic chemicals and result in potential biological and physical hazards. In this article we look at occupational health issues in the pharmaceutical and chemical industries (excluding petrochemical, plastics, and rubber manufacturing). (Rubber is covered on pages 215-9.)

We have considered the chemical and pharmaceutical industries together because of the similarities in recognizing, preventing, and correcting the occupational health problems found there. However, there is obviously a great diversity of workplace conditions and work demands within these industries.

The general principles and selected resources we outline are relevant to these industries (and others), but some of the specific approaches and considerations discussed may not be applicable to all work environments.

Skin and respiratory disorders are the predominant occupational illnesses in chemical industries. Musculoskeletal pain problems and job stress, although not unique to the chemical industry, are being reported with increasing frequency throughout the United States workforce. We have selected for discussion the hazards and health effects characteristic of the pharmaceutical and chemical industries even though exposure to these hazards may be trivial or nonexistent for many employees. We emphasize our first principle: The prevention and diagnosis of occupational health problems demands that job characteristics be explored and defined in some detail. Relevant resources appear in the Appendix, page 200.

Dr. Moon is Assistant Professor, Division of Occupational and Environmental Medicine, Box 2914, Duke University Medical Center, Durham 27710, and Dr. Powell is Director of Occupational Health Services at Glaxo, Inc., 5 Moore Drive, Research Triangle Park 27709.

Health Problems of Chemical Workers

When assessing a chemical worker for an occupational disorder, the history of the illness should include details concerning the relationship of the problem to the work setting. We want to know whether specific agents have been used; the cumulative dose and timing of exposure relative to the onset of symptoms; the pattern, duration, and routes of chemical exposure; whether there are similar cases at the workplace; and whether personal protective equipment was used (Fig. 1, at right). The exposure history should include dates of exposure, any prior exposures, qualitative and quantitative estimates of airborne and surface levels of the suspected agent(s), and decontamination procedures. This information allows us to estimate the dose received. Thereafter, a treatment plan can be established that takes into account the need for work restrictions or exposure protection and the ultimate prevention of further problems.

Occupational Skin Disorders

Dermatitis, the most common occupational illness in the US, often occurs in chemical and pharmaceutical workers. Contact dermatitis is characterized by an erythematous, often pruritic rash whose distribution (for example, around the wrists of a worker who wears gloves) suggests direct skin contact with an irritant or allergenic agent. Approximately 80% of contact dermatitis cases are due to irritation, not allergy. In chronic cases, the skin becomes thickened and lichenified. Diagnosis requires correlating the anatomic location, the nature and duration of exposure, and the irritant or allergenic potential of suspect substances.

The likelihood that a chemical agent will cause contact dermatitis is increased when the agent is caustic or corrosive, has a low molecular weight, or high polarity. Concomitant exposure to multiple agents is common in cases of irritant contact dermatitis. Chemical and pharmaceutical workers are exposed to cleaning agents (soaps, detergents, and others), agricultural chemicals, pharmaceuticals (including local anesthetics, tetracyclines, beta lactam antibiotics, and sulfone chloramides), plastics, resins, and solvents (acetone, chlorinated hydrocarbons, toluene, xylene, petroleum distillates, and alcohols). The propensity of an agent to cause dermatitis may be listed in the manufacturer's Material Safety Data sheet, which must be maintained at the site where the chemical is used.

Allergic contact dermatitis requires prior immunologic sensitization, sometimes promoted by a preceding irritant dermatitis that damages the skin barrier. Therefore, sensitizing agents with high irritant properties are of particular concern. Patch testing may be helpful in diagnosing allergic contact dermatitis.

Treatment of occupational dermatitis involves prevention of exposure to the causative agent, treatment with glucocorticoid preparations (if appropriate), and proper skin hygiene. Since occupational dermatitis often affects the hands, hand washing practices and the kinds of soaps or other agents used should be reviewed. Chemical and pharmaceutical workers often wear protective gloves; the resulting occlusion or the use of powder on the gloves may actually cause or promote dermatitis.

Allergy to latex itself is increasingly recognized and may cause serious systemic manifestations. The clinical history may suggest the diagnosis but be less than definitive. Sometimes protective gloves made of synthetic or natural rubber latex may actually cause contact hypersensitivity. A successful trial of alternative glove materials (plastic under-gloves, vinyl gloves) supports the diagnosis and provides a pragmatic solution. Confirmed or suspected latex allergy requires that patients avoid contact with latex in other situations.

Occupational Respiratory Disorders

Many chemical compounds and particulates can cause simple respiratory irritation—organic solvents, acids, caustic solutions, and irritant gases; a few are pulmonary sensitizers or asthma-inducing agents—amines, urea, diisocyanates, anhydrides, and certain dyes, metal fumes/salts, enzymes, and pharmaceutical compounds. Pharmaceutical agents that can cause asthma after inhalation include antibiotics (penicillins,² tetracycline), methyl dopa, psyllium, papain, ipecacuanha, cimetidine, and enflurane. Exposure to airborne irritants may cause conjunctivitis, pharyngitis, cough, or airways reactivity. Some compounds may cause delayed pulmonary edema (meaning patients with significant exposures need prolonged monitoring; see the article by Darcey and Young on page 222), but high-dose exposure to pulmonary irritants rarely produces long-term effects.³ Irritant effects tend to resolve once exposure has been discontinued.

Substantial exposures are usually required to produce irritant effects, although allergic reactions frequently occur through repeated exposure to low levels of sensitizing agents. Occupational allergies include conjunctivitis, rhinitis, cough, and wheezing (asthma). Occupational asthma may exhibit an immediate, delayed, or dual response. Acute symptomatic care is appropriate treatment of irritant and allergic respiratory disorders. Serial measurements of peak respiratory flow, sometimes before and after work shifts, may be used to monitor workers for recurrent problems. Preventing further exposure is especially important for sensitized workers. This may require the use of personal protective equipment, engineering controls, or removal from the workplace.

Prolonged exposure to some respiratory irritants may lead to chronic bronchitis. Although this is not a common problem in the chemical or pharmaceutical industries, long-term exposure to acid or caustic mists, or to inorganic gases (sulfur dioxide, ozone, chlorine, oxides of nitrogen) may produce chronic bronchitis and should be avoided.

With some exceptions, cancer of the respiratory tract is not a frequent result of exposures in the modern chemical or pharmaceutical industry. Possible exceptions include the association of lung cancer with arsenical pesticides or chromium-containing pigments. Upper respiratory tract cancer has been linked to formaldehyde exposure, but the epidemiological basis of this association is controversial.

Handlers of laboratory animals may develop laboratory animal allergy (LAA), a condition characterized by rhinitis, conjunctivitis, urticaria, angioedema, or asthma. The prevalence of LAA among workers in the US is around 10% to 30%. Nasal symptoms predominate and typically precede or accompany asthmatic symptoms;⁴ prevention of the latter is particularly important.

LAA develops through an IgE-mediated sensitivity to allergens in urine, fur, serum, or saliva of laboratory animals. Prevention and management of LAA depends on reducing skin contact with or inhalation of the allergens. The first step is to focus on methods and procedures for handling, cleaning, housing, and transferring animals.⁵ The use of gowns, gloves, shoe covers, and respiratory protection devices such as face masks can reduce exposure. All respirator devices must be tested to assure a proper fit. The appropriate choice of respirator depends on the severity and nature of LAA symptoms or, in some cases, the presence of factors that predispose to the development of LAA (a family history of atopy, personal history of atopy, positive skin prick tests, clevated specific IgE levels, work with multiple species, and duration of exposure to animals). It is difficult to justify a policy of excluding workers from animal handling jobs because of risk factors alone.^{6,7} Those who do enter such a job, though, should use every means to reduce exposure and must be closely monitored for LAA symptoms.

Occupational Reproductive Health

Reproductive and developmental disorders have received much attention in the past 20 years. The scope of this article permits us only to touch on the complexities of risk assessment and the prevention of these disorders. Several factors deserve mention:

1) the paucity of research data that would allow us to identify and quantify occupational reproductive hazards; 2) the high "background" rate of adverse reproductive outcomes; 3) the nature of critical exposure intervals during or before pregnancy; and 4) the current apparent illegality of nominally protective (restrictive) workplace policies that discriminate by gender.

In general, there are no precisely defined, reproductively "safe" levels of exposure to the chemicals and drugs encountered in the workplace because animal and human data are inadequate. There are some known or suspected human reproductive and development toxicants—lead, methyl mercury, toluene, carbon disulfide, ethylene glycol ethers, estrogens, ethylene oxide, several pesticides, polychlorinated biphenyls, and some organochlorines. However, this short list of known or suspected agents is woefully insufficient. We must often extrapolate and draw assumptions about a much larger group of provisionally suspect carcinogens or mutagens. We must also scrutinize investigational compounds or chemical reaction intermediates and assess and monitor radionuclide exposure.

Whenever known or suspected reproductive or developmental toxicants are used, it may be helpful to provide prevention-oriented preconception or postconception consultations. These assessments need to be done methodically and should include thorough communication to the worker of the findings and risks. Two parallel dynamics frequently emerge: 1) exposure must be reduced to the lowest achievable level, and 2) employees themselves must make decisions about the acceptability of risks. It is crucial to distinguish between "working with" and "exposure to" (that is, the absorption of) a toxic substance. This distinction guides the evaluation and modification of the work environment, work methods, and personal protective equipment.

Occupational Cancer

The estimated percentage of the number of all cancers that are attributable to occupation exposure ranges from 4% up to a heavily criticized 23%-38%. Some authorities suggest that 10% represents current consensus. The International Agency for Research on Cancer classifies agents or manufacturing processes into one of five categories of carcinogen: 1) known, 2) probable, 3) possible, 4) not a human carcinogen, or 5) not classifiable. As of 1990, there were 21 "known" carcinogenic processes or agents potentially present during chemical production. These include some choloromethyl ethers (lung cancer), chromium, arsenic, vinyl chloride, benzene, benzidine, 4-aminobiphenyl, and the manufacture of isopropanol. 11

The list of suspect occupational carcinogens is much longer, due in part to insufficient data regarding human susceptibility to many animal carcinogens. We may summarize by saying that carcinogenesis is a concern in chemical and pharmaceutical manufacturing and research environments. Primary emphasis is on prevention through reduction or elimination of exposure to known or suspect agents. Although research may eventually provide methods to identify cellular damage that increases cancer risk, we currently monitor by periodic, broadbased screening through history, physical exam, and hematologic and biochemical blood testing.

Occupational Musculoskeletal Disorders

In virtually all industries, concern over workplace ergonomics has risen rapidly in the past decade because of the high prevalence and costs of musculoskeletal disorders. Back pain and upper extremity injuries ("cumulative trauma disorders") are common, but establishing a relationship of the musculoskeletal complaints to any occupation is problematic (see article by Frazier, et al, page 189).

The pharmaceutical and chemical industries rely on lifting, carrying, and transferring loads by hand in their factories. Tasks that provide biomechanical stress to the arm and hand include pipetting and the dosing of animals (usually with syringes). Neither has been rigorously analyzed as a risk factor, but anecdotal experience suggests a link with upper extremity soft tissue pain disorders.

Prevention of musculoskeletal disorders should be based on a workplace risk assessment and elimination of high-risk activities through engineering and administrative controls. Workers should be educated in ergonomics and proper biomechanics and provided with reasonable leeway to structure how tasks are done.

Occupational Toxicological Disorders

In the pharmaceutical industry, products are designed to have a biological effect. In general, the desired effect is associated with other unwanted but avoidable effects. Because the chemicals are biologically active, acceptable limits of exposure are often far lower than those in other chemical industries; exposure may cause systemic disorders of a pharmacological nature due to an intended or an adverse effect (for instance, hypotension caused by an antihypertensive).

In the chemical industry, organic and inorganic compounds are used in synthetic reactions. The nature of these active compounds allows them to readily react with human tissues and lead, depending on the compound, to gastrointestinal, hematologic, renal, behavioral, or neurological abnormalities. For example, benzene is toxic to the hematopoietic system; aminothiazole causes nausea and vomiting; and n-hexane, trichloroethylene, and methyl butyl ketone can produce neuropathy. Acute exposure to organic solvents impairs coordination, balance, response speed, and manual dexterity. All must be used with care. In addition, intermediates in chemical reactions are also often very active. Chlorinating, sulphonating, acetylating, nitrating, and methylating agents are active chemicals capable of causing poisoning.

Conclusions

The pharmaceutical and chemical industries, in general, have health and safety resources to help prevent occupational ill health. Often, comprehensive monitoring programs are in place and the risks of work are well-known. Occupational health physicians are poised to recognize and intervene when known or suspected health problems arise in the worksite.

Community physicians may lack sufficient time, knowledge, or experience to fully resolve complex questions of work-related health effects in chemical and pharmaceutical workers. However, they are well-positioned to initiate a process that complements a company's own health and safety resources. By contacting the patient's employer, the physician may confirm a diagnosis, get assistance in a treatment plan, gain cooperation for the appropriate return to work of the affected employee, and help to prevent subsequent cases of ill health in the work-force.

Appendix: Selected Resources

Material safety data sheets (MSDS):

Federal regulations require employers to make available to workers an information sheet for each hazardous chemical product used in the workplace. The MSDS summarizes ingredients; chemical composition; physical data such as color, solubility, and vapor pressure; fire and explosion information; health hazard information; first aid procedures; procedures for spills or leaks; protective equipment information; special precautions for safe handling and use; and regulatory information. The Chemical Abstract System (CAS) number, which can greatly facilitate additional research, is included on the MSDS.

The MSDS provides a sense of potential toxicity and initial considerations in the evaluation and treatment of exposure-related illnesses. However, supplemental information is desirable when significant patient care decisions must be made.

National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH): Call 800/356-4674 for information on workplace hazards.

Occupational physician:

An Occupational Medicine physician may be available for consultation or be employed by the patient's employer. This physician may be able to provide information about occupational diseases, the particular work environment, similar problems in co-workers, or options for work modifications. Often employees can be returned to modified duty jobs without loss of pay while recuperating from illnesses and injuries.

Industrial hygienist:

Chemical and pharmaceutical companies often employ industrial hygienists who can provide invaluable information about the level and duration of workplace exposure, the routes of exposure, and the likely nature of any exposures. The industrial hygienist can also recommend changes in work processes or the use of personal protective equipment to reduce or eliminate exposure.

Threshold limit values:

The American Conference of Governmental Industrial Hygienists (ACGIH) publishes the annually updated Threshold Limit Values (TLVs) for Chemical Substances and Physical Agents and Biological Exposure Indices. TLVs are maximum occupational exposure levels considered safe for most workers for many industrial chemicals (and for physical factors such as vibration, radiation, heat, and noise).

For chemicals, the recommended levels are typically expressed as eight hour, time-weighted averages. Short-term exposure limits (STELs) are detailed for some chemicals, representing maximum recommended exposure levels for up to a 15-minute period. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration promulgates permissible exposure limits (PELs), which aim to protect all workers, carry regulatory authority, and are often identical to the ACGIH TLVs and STELs for a given compound.

Occupational Hazards in the Furniture Industry

David P. Siebens, MD, MPH, and Lane Tippens, MD

The furniture industry in North Carolina employs approximately 78,000 people. Occupational illness and injury rates for this industry are about the same as those of other manufacturing industries in the state. Nevertheless, certain occupational health problems are prevalent in furniture workers; we review some of those problems here.

Wood Dust Exposure

Dermatitis. Contact dermatitis is the most common occupational illness; many kinds of wood dusts cause it. Workers most at risk are those involved in sanding operations. Contact dermatitis arising from wood dust exposure may have either irritant or allergic etiologies, but the heartwood used in furniture manufacture usually causes allergic sensitization. Symptoms (pruritus and erythema) typically develop slowly and after long exposure to wood dust. Initially, exposed skin on the face, eyelids, forearms, and dorsa of the hands is involved; subsequently, the intertriginous areas of the axillae and groin. Very fine dust may collect in clothing and cause dermatitis at the neckline, cuffs, or wherever clothing is held tight to the skin. Shoes impregnated with dust may produce continuous exposure. If wood dust dermatitis is suspected on the basis of the occupational history and appearance of the dermatitis, it can frequently be confirmed by patch testing.²

Asthma. Wood dust can cause bronchial asthma, but the true prevalence of this disorder is difficult to establish because it is not easy to identify subjects with asthma. Cross-sectional studies underestimate the prevalence because affected workers remove themselves from the industry (the "healthy worker effect"). Most extensively studied is the bronchospasm caused by inhaling the dust of western red cedar; about 5% of exposed workers develop asthma. Numerous other wood types have been implicated in asthma, including the oak, mahogany, and cherry commonly used in furniture manufacture. 4

The mechanisms by which wood dusts cause asthma are not clearly understood. There may be several. For example, in the case of western red cedar dust, there is evidence for direct activation of acetylcholine receptors, classical complement pathway activation, release of histamine and leukotrienes, and induction of specific IgE antibodies.⁴

It is not possible to distinguish wood dust asthma (or any occupational asthma) clinically from non-specific or endogenous asthma. The most important factor in making the diagnosis is a temporal relationship to exposure. Symptoms (cough, shortness of breath, wheezing) may occur immediately upon exposure; be delayed, occurring only at home; or be biphasic, occurring both in and out of the workplace. As a result, establishing the temporal relationship between work and symptoms is sometimes less than straightforward, but a report that symptoms resolve during prolonged absences from work is essential. Recognition of wood dust asthma is important because the longer the duration of exposure, the more likely the symptoms will progress to prolonged or irreversible disease,3 Aside from eliminating exposure through the use of personal protective equipment or removal from the workplace, the treatment of wood dust asthma is the same as for all other types of asthma.

A derivative of wood that causes occupational asthma is colophony (rosin), a distillate of pine tree oleoresin. It is used as a solder flux and is a cause of asthma among electronics workers (see article by Darcey and Young, page 222).⁴

Pneumonitis. Hypersensitivity pneumonitis such as maple bark stripper's disease results from inhalation of bark particles contaminated by fungal species. It is most commonly seen in the lumbering and paper industries. Hypersensitivity pneumonitis from wood dust not contaminated by fungi is rare.⁴

Cancer. Occupational exposure to wood dust increases the risk of adenocarcinoma of the nasopharynx. It is not clear whether the association reflects exposure to wood dust itself, to chemical additives used in the manufacture of wood products, or other risk factors associated with the exposure, but the greatest risk of nasopharyngeal cancer appears to be associated with exposure to hardwood dust without chemical additives. Wood dust has been implicated in other cancers, but there is no solid epidemiological evidence for such an association. Nasal cancer is relatively uncommon, but a history of wood dust exposure should raise the possibility in patients presenting with complaints referable to the nasopharynx.

Noise Exposure

Furniture workers can be exposed to considerable noise, producing annoyance, headaches, tinnitus, ear pain, and ultimately, hearing loss. Noise-induced hearing loss is typically binaural and caused by mechanical- and metabolic stress-induced loss of sensory cells within the cochlea. The hearing loss is most severe at higher frequencies, typically above 4000 Hz. It often progresses slowly and may be first noticed by family members. Noise-induced dcafness is entirely preventable through the use of hearing protection, and the clinician can provide an invaluable service simply by asking about noise exposure and emphasizing the importance of hearing protection to workers with high-level exposure.6

The OSHA standard states that an eight-hour, time-weighted average noise level of 85 dB is loud enough to damage hearing (and hence requires hearing protection). This figure is relatively meaningless unless sound levels are measured (and this is done all too infrequently). Sound levels can be crudely estimated by comparison to familiar sounds (Table 1).

Vibration

Prolonged exposure to vibration can cause a characteristic constellation of peripheral vascular, neurologic, and musculoskeletal abnormalities known as the "handarm vibration syndrome." It is found wherever vibrating tools (sanders, grinders, pneumatic hammers and drivers, jackhammers, and chainsaws) are used.⁶ Attack rates as high as 100% have been reported for some work groups.

The most common symptoms are peripheral vasospasm indistinguishable from primary Raynaud's phenomenon, distal pain, and paresthesias. The most pronounced clinical abnormality is a diffuse or focal peripheral sensory loss, which may mimic nerve compression. About 20% of symptomatic patients show slowing of median nerve conduction at the wrist, which causes hand-arm vibration syndrome to be confused with carpal tunnel syndrome. The distinction is important because treatment of the wrong condition leads to a poor response to carpal tunnel decompression, particularly if exposure to vibration continues. Whenever a diagnosis of Raynaud's syndrome or peripheral neuropathy is considered, a good occupational history may identify vibration as an eminently treatable cause. Treatment consists of using anti-vibration gloves and removal of the worker from jobs associated with vibration. Calcium channel blockers may be effective.6

Chemical Exposure

Furniture workers are exposed to wood glues and resins, strippers, finishes, and preservatives. Wood binding glues may contain formaldehyde, epoxy and phenol resins, and trichloroethylene. Paint strippers contain a number of solvents including toluene and methylene chloride; paints and finishes may contain mineral spirits, toluene, turpentine, and alcohol. Chromated copper arsenate pentachlorophenol and creosote, used as wood preservatives,7 can cause dermatologic, neurologic, renal, and respiratory disorders and have been implicated as possible carcinogens. Overexposure to some solvents has even resulted in death.

The epoxy resins used in glues cause many of the work-related dermatoses. Other chemicals used in the furniture industry are potential skin sensitizers:

ethylenediamine, a resin hardener, has been associated with contact dermatitis;⁸ and so have the phenol- and formaldehyde-based resins used in some decorative paper sheets.⁹ Turpentine, although now rarely used, is a potent skin sensitizer. And prolonged contact with defatting solvents may cause dry skin-related dermatitis.

Paint strippers, paints, and finishes contain a number of organic solvents, many of which are known neurotoxins. Absorption is chiefly pulmonary, though dermal absorption can occur. Acute solvent neurotoxicity may present as narcosis, or as dizziness, nausea, confusion, or delirium. Significant air concentrations of solvents may be generated when large surface areas are treated in an enclosed area. Solvent concentrations can reach dangerously high, even lethal, levels. Sudden death is due to cardiac dysrhythmias, particularly from halogenated solvents. 10

Application of organic solvents to large evaporative surface areas, such as in furniture finishing and painting, represents the greatest potential for exposure. 11 Toluene, methylene chloride, methylethyl and methyl-butyl ketone, and the trichloroethylene present in some furniture glues can depress central nervous system function. Chronic overexposure to these substances may result in "painter's syndrome"-fatigue, memory disturbance, personality changes, headache, and irritability ranging in severity from mild to incapacitating dementia. Epidemiological studies from Scandinavia found that mixed solvent exposure caused most cases;13-14 solvent-induced dementia is considered a compensable occupational illness there.

Mineral spirits—white spirits, varnish makers' and painters' naphtha—are often used in finishes and paints, but they may vary in composition. Distal peripheral neuropathies are potential hazards when methyl butyl ketone (MBK) or hexane are components of mineral spirits. The neuropathy may be irreversible. 14

Elevated levels of methylene chloride, used in furniture stripping, have been documented in the breathing zones of woodworkers; fatalities have been reported. Stripping the metabolism of methylene chloride, makes this particular solvent uniquely hazardous to workers. Because carbon monoxide can exacerbate cardiac ischemia, use of methylene chloride by workers with coronary artery disease is particularly dangerous. Smokers, who have clevated carboxyhemoglobin levels, are especially susceptible to carbon monoxide toxicity.

Chemicals used in the furniture industry may contribute to the overall rate of cancer in workers. Prolonged airway exposure to formaldehyde causes nasal carcinoma in rats, and formaldehyde may add a synergistic effect to wood dust in producing nasal cancer in humans. A similar additive effect has been suggested for co-exposures to wood dust, paint lacquer, and glue. A

Pentachlorophenol (PCP) is an antifungal, curing agent used in outdoor structural wood. Chromated copper arsenate pentachlorophenol is used as a preservative in furniture woods. PCP can cause acute and chronic toxicity in humans, due to interference with oxidative phosphorylation. Epidemiological studies suggest that exposure to PCP may increase the risk for soft tissue sarcoma, nasal carcinoma, and glioma. 19

Respiratory dysfunction may result from chronic exposure to chemicals used in the furniture industry. In several instances, epoxy resins have been associated with occupational asthma.^{20,21} Formaldehyde, found in many glues, is a respiratory irritant; exposed workers have an increased number of chest complaints such as productive cough, breathlessness and chest tightness,²² and a greater incidence of bronchitis.²³ There is evidence for short-term impairment of pulmonary function in formaldehyde-exposed workers,^{21,24} but the data regarding long-term decline in lung function are conflicting.^{21,23,25,26}

The renal system may be impaired by solvent exposure. Short-term, high-concentration exposure to a number of organic solvents, including toluene, has resulted in solvent-induced acute tubular necrosis.²⁷ Less conclusive are the data suggesting an association between long-term solvent exposure and chronic renal disease.²⁸ We would not anticipate chronic hepatic or hematologic disease due to the substances commonly used in the contemporary furniture industry.

Occupational Health in the Textile Industry

Harold R. Imbus, MD, ScD

Few North Carolina physicians do not care for least some people who work in the textile industry. Executives, managers, or hourly workers, these persons seek care for their own health problems and those of their families. Since textile industry employees work as pilots and computer programmers, secretaries and accountants, carders, spinners, and weavers, dyers and finishers, water and waste treatment workers, most of their health problems are similar to those of workers everywhere, but some are special to the textile industry. This article will discuss those special problems and briefly discuss others that textile employees share with workers in other industries.

Medical Assessment of the Textile Worker

In caring for textile workers it is important to have some understanding of the industry and the type of jobs that the employees do. This will help when there are questions about whether a health problem is occupationally related. It is important not to jump to conclusions. I have seen "byssinosis" diagnosed in textile employees who are not exposed to cotton dust, and occupational carpal tunnel syndrome diagnosed in those who have little risk of developing it.

Dr. Imbus is a private consultant in occupational medicine, 820 Pebble Drive, Greensboro 27410.

Several questions need answering if we are to assess the possible relationship of the person's occupation to disease:

1. What materials does the person work with? Fibers used in the textile industry may be natural or synthetic. Natural fibers are usually cotton, but may be flax, hemp, jute, silk, or wool. Synthetic fibers may be polyester, acrylic, nylon, polypropylene, or rayon. Natural fibers are considered biologically active; synthetic fibers generally are not. We also want to know whether the person works with dyes or other chemicals; if so what are they?

2. What manufacturing processes are used in the plant where the person works? Textile plants may be totally integrated (in which raw fiber is converted to yarn and then to a finished piece of cloth), or they may be limited to the manufacturing of yarn, cloth, or carpet. Textile manufacture entails several processes: preparation of fibers, spinning of fibers into yarn, weaving or knitting, cloth inspection, dyeing and finishing of the cloth, and sewing of the cloth into the final product. Preparation and spinning typically tend to produce dust exposure but little chemical exposure; weaving, noise exposure; dying and finishing, potential chemical exposure; sewing, exposure to lint, sometimes formaldehyde, and ergonomic stressors. Fortunately many modern textile plants have good ventilation and must comply with strict OSHA standards. Therefore, most exposures are slight.

3. Where in the facility does the employee work and what are the specific job duties? A maintenance mechanic who works all over the plant may have intermittent exposure to many different substances. Many other workers have stable occupations such as carding, spinning, and weaving and may stay in the same job for many years in which case it is relatively easy to characterize exposure.

Textile Industry Health Concerns

Few health issues are peculiar to textile manufacturing. Most problems—noise, repetitive motion, chemical exposure—are shared with other industries. In fact, most textile occupational health problems are not diseases at all, just injuries. Falls, back strains, cuts, and more serious injuries are major safety issues. The safety record in the textile industry is good, and working in the industry would not generally be classified as hazardous, compared to other industries.

Byssinosis. One health problem that has been a major issue in the textile industry is byssinosis. Byssinosis was described in England and other countries but not generally recognized in the US until the late 1960s and early 1970s. It became a major health, regulatory, and political issue in the 1970s.

Byssinosis is caused by inhaling the dust of cotton (or flax or hemp) but not the fiber itself. In the process of picking cotton, leaves and stems get mixed in with the fiber. Modern mechanical picking produces more of this contamination than hand picking. Some authors contend that the bract leaf just below the cotton boll contains irritating chemical substances that cause bronchospasm; others say that bacteria, which grow in the cotton dust during storage, produce endotoxin, which results in the bronchospasm of byssinosis. There is an association between levels of endotoxin in cotton dust and in the workplace air, and the prevalence of byssinosis.²

The first symptoms of byssinosis are a mild tightness in the chest, perhaps some cough, wheezing, and shortness of breath. As Schilling3 describes, symptoms are most prominent on the first day of the work week. In the beginning symptoms occur only occasionally, such as when the weather is excessively humid. This stage is classified as Grade 1/2 byssinosis. As the disorder progresses to Grade I, the worker notices tightness on most or all Mondays (if that is the first day of the work week.) With further time, usually several years, Grade 11 byssinosis is reached; symptoms occur on days other than Monday, but the condition characteristically is worse at the beginning of the week and improved toward the end, an important diagnostic point since nonspecific airway reactivity does not improve, or may worsen as the work week progresses. Up to Grade II the disorder is considered reversible, if exposure is reduced or removed. However, if exposure continues the person may develop Grade III byssinosis: chronic bronchitis or asthmatic bronchitis progressing to irreversible airways obstruction.

The reversible bronchospasm of byssinosis can often be demonstrated by carrying out spirometry on the first day of the work week before the worker enters the workplace and again about six hours into the shift, to determine if there has been a decline in FEV₁. Though not the most sensitive measurement, the FEV₁ is an accepted means of demonstrating bronchial reactivity to cotton dust, and measurement of it and FVC are required by OSHA's cotton dust standard. A 10% decline in FEV₁ is evidence that a person may be a cotton dust (byssinotic) reactor. However, OSHA considers even a 5% decline significant and requires that such individuals be placed under increased surveillance. Since a 20% decline in FEV₁ is required to interpret a methacholine challenge test as positive, it is apparent that the bronchospasm of byssinosis is usually mild at first.

In 1970, when I first began work in the textile industry, I would see individuals whose disease had progressed through the classic stages described above. Sometimes up to 30% of employees gave a history of Monday morning tightness. It was not unusual to find 15%-20% of employees whose FEV, declined 10% or more during the shift. In recent years, because of better control of cotton dust and earlier detection, symptoms of Monday chest tightness are rare, and only 3%-5% of workers have a 10% decline in FEV, what is found in the general population when tested twice within six hours.

Chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD. Byssinosis has now been supplanted by COPD in cotton textile workers. Affected workers are often cigarette smokers and the question is whether smoking, cotton dust, or a combination thereof has caused COPD. The answer to this question has important health and compensation implications for the employee, the doctor, and the employer. Many studies have shown that the ill effects of smoking and cotton dust are additive.6 A recent study suggests that smokers may be susceptible to lower levels of cotton dust exposure than are nonsmoking workers.7 What should the doctor advise cotton textile workers who have developed COPD? Often these individuals have worked in the textile industry for many years. Job change may not be an option, although sometimes it is possible to transfer workers to areas in the plant that are not exposed to cotton dust. I have found that, when screening has identified COPD at an early stage, cessation of smoking will arrest the process even though the job is not changed. Physicians should urge their patients to quit smoking and help them to do so.

Another option, somewhat less desirable in the treatment of byssinosis, is the use of a respirator. Respirators come in several varieties. The negative pressure respirator depends on the suction force of inspiration to filter the inspired air. Respirators with disposable cartridges are more comfortable than those with permanent cartridges, but they are still a difficult option for a lifetime of work. The powered, air purifying respirator is reasonably comfortable and does not add to the work of breathing, but it is expensive to purchase and maintain.

The cotton textile worker with COPD represents a serious concern from ethical, legal, and workers' compensation standpoints. The Americans With Disabilities Act adds a new dimension because it requires employers to make reasonable accommodations for employees with disabilities. How this can be done reasonably is not always clear. Furthermore, under workers' compensation employers are responsible for any pulmonary disability, even if cotton dust exposure caused only a small proportion of the disability. NC law does not allow apportionment of causality in determining monetary awards under workers' compensation. There is no simple answer to these issues, but surprisingly, in many instances cooperation by worker, physician, and employer has satisfactorily resolved the problem.

Another new issue brought up by the Americans with Disabilities Act relates to the hiring process. The cotton textile industry previously would not hire persons with an FEV₁ less than 80% of predicted. This is no longer permissible. Each case must be judged individually, and reasonable accommodations must be made. At times the physician may be asked to determine whether work-related exposure to cotton dust would present a significant risk of substantial harm to the employee applicant.

Asthma. Occasionally an atopic employee reacts to cotton dust exposure with acute or subacute asthma due to pollens and other contaminants of cotton dust. Allergy work-up may identify the antigens. Spirometry before and after the work shift can determine whether there is a significant drop in FEV₁ during the exposure. After evaluation the physician is in a better position to advise the patient, but most of these individuals decide to leave the industry because of the obvious correlation of symptoms with work. The only obvious solution to this problem is removal from exposure. On the other hand, some individuals with long-standing asthma note no correlation of symptoms with working in the cotton textile industry. In fact, a number of them have told me that they feel better in the mill's air-conditioned environment.

Other pulmonary conditions noted in the cotton textile industry workers include "mill fever" and "weaver's cough," which are thought to be due to inhalation of microorganism contaminants of air conditioning systems.

Synthetic fibers. Synthetic fibers—polyester, acrylic, nylon, rayon, and polypropylenc-have long been considered biologically inert. In fact, during early studies of byssinosis workers exposed to synthetic fibers were used as controls for studies of cotton-exposed workers.8 Preand post-shift spirometry showed no changes due to acute exposure to synthetic workers. Furthermore, the mean FEV, of synthetic fibers workers was normal, yet that of cotton workers was lower. However a recent longitudinal study showed a surprising and unexplained result: Workers in synthetic fiber mills had greater annual decline in FEV, than workers in cotton mills.7 This result cannot be explained by our knowledge of synthetic fibers. Additional research will be necessary both to validate the results and to explain them if validated.

Chemicals. The textile industry uses numerous chemicals. The largest number are used in the dyeing and finishing of yarn or cloth. In addition to detergents, brighteners, softeners, and bleaches, one group, the reactive dyes, are known to cause occupational asthma. The typical history is that an employee who mixes or applies these dyes develops wheezing or frank asthma upon exposure. At first the symptoms may be mild, but they tend to get progressively worse. I know of one case of near-fatal anaphylactic reaction in a worker who had previous wheezing upon exposure. Material Safety Data sheets will identify the type of dye, and often will indicate whether it is known to cause respiratory sensitization. Many textile dyes are now supplied as pastes rather than powders, reducing the potential for exposure and sensitization. Other dyes, such as the azo dyes, may be skin sensitizers. Description of found allergic or irritant contact dermatitis to be a serious problem in the industry.

Formaldehyde. Formaldehyde is commonly used to produce a "permanent press" finish on apparel fabrics. Workers may be exposed to it during the finishing or sewing of cloth. Formaldehyde long has been known to irritate respiratory and eye mucosa and can cause skin problems.

Contact dermatitis from formaldehyde may be irritant or allergic. Patch testing with a 1%-2% aqueous solution of formaldehyde by someone experienced in the technique of the test and its interpretation will usually make the differentiation. Less commonly, formaldchydc produces contact urticaria by either an allergic or non-allergic mechanism. Nonallergic contact urticaria is usually confined to the area of contact; the allergic type produces lesions in non-contact areas. A routine patch test may miss this type but observation for several minutes after open application of 1%-2% solution will confirm the diagnosis. Contact dermatitis due to the wearing of formaldehyde-finished fabrics is uncommon because residual free formaldehyde on the fabric is carefully controlled, usually to less than 300 ppm.

Upper respiratory and eye irritation are common when air concentrations of formaldehyde exceed 1 ppm. The current permissible exposure limit established by OSHA is 0.75 ppm. Most textile manufacturing operations maintain formaldehyde levels below 0.5 ppm. At levels of 0.5 ppm or above, OSHA requires exposed workers to complete a periodic questionnaire to determine whether symptoms are present that may be referable to formaldehyde exposure.

Some individuals develop respiratory sensitization to formaldehyde. The symptoms resemble allergic rhinitis, but asthma may also occur, usually after relatively high exposures.12 IgE and IgG antibodies have been identified in several individuals with formaldehyde asthma,13 but in most cases the mechanism of asthma is not understood. Unfortunately, there are no simple tests to diagnose formaldehyde asthma. Prick tests with dilute solutions have not been standardized. Inhalation challenge tests are meaningless and potentially dangerous unless done under carefully controlled conditions in an inhalation chamber. Such tests are available only in specialized centers, usually at universities, and are expensive and time consuming. Another option, if the symptomatic worker is still being exposed to formaldehyde, is to carry out a clinical respiratory examination and spirometry before and after the work shift to observe for differences.

Recently, formaldehyde has been identified as an animal carcinogen, producing nasal cancer in rats and mice after prolonged high-level exposure at 15 ppm. Whether this was primarily due to its irritant (cytotoxic) effects or a genotoxic mechanism is controversial. Epidemiological studies have shown no consistent associations between formaldehyde exposure and human cancer.

Other organic solvents. Aliphatic hydrocarbons such as Stoddard's solvent, mineral spirits, or keroscne are used to clean parts and equipment. A chlorinated hydrocarbon, 1,1,1 trichloroethane, is used to clean equipment and spot-clean cloth. Any of these solvents can cause dermatitis due to defatting and irritation. They, like all solvents, are central nervous system depressants, but the chlorinated solvents have the further potential of hepatotoxicity and renal toxicity. Fortunately, studies of textile workers exposed to 1,1,1 trichloroethane have not detected any problems.¹⁴

Cumulative trauma disorders (CTDs). Cumulative trauma disorders have existed in the textile, and other industries, for many years. Recently there has been a marked increase rate of diagnosis for a variety of reasons, some of which are not fully understood. Carpal tunnel syndrome and tendinitis are probably the most frequently diagnosed CTDs, but a study of the textile industry found that true carpal tunnel syndrome represented only a small percentage of the cases.¹⁵

It is important to remember that many textile jobs involve frequent reaching above shoulder height. In my experience, muscular problems of the neck, trapezius, interscapular, and shoulder regions are relatively common. I have seen many workers with pain, spasm, and trigger points in these regions. They may also have upper extremity pain and paresthesias, suggestive of thoracic outlet syndrome or carpal tunnel syndrome. Many of them have had carpal tunnel release with poor results. Like other occupational medicine physicians, I generally find the results of carpal tunnel surgery in textile workers very discouraging. Middle-aged textile workers, like people everywhere, often have cervical spondylosis, which may simulate carpal tunnel syndrome. I usually recommend conservative treatment and attention to biomechanical and ergonomic issues of the whole upper extremity.

Noise. Many textile workers are exposed to noise above 90 decibels on the A scale (DbA), certainly over 85 DbA. Older weaving looms produced noise levels of 103 DbA-108 DbA, and noise-induced hearing loss was very common. Fortunately, much progress has been made. OSHA requires annual audiometric testing of workers exposed to time-weighted average noise above 85 DbA during an eight-hour shift, and ear protection for those exposed to more than 90 DbA. Proper ear protection devices have been shown to preserve hearing, and hearing loss in textile workers is now much less common. In addition newer spinning and weaving equipment is quieter, but usually not so quiet that hearing conservation measures are unnecessary.

Women's Health Issues

Many textile employees are women. Naturally, reproductive health issues have recently surfaced, and epidemiologic studies of reproductive outcomes in female textile workers are under way. However, the interpretation of such studies, even if they show an adverse trend, will require further studies to determine whether this is peculiar to textile workers or to blue collar workers in general.

For the most part, the textile industry does not utilize known teratogens. But because lack of prenatal care is an established risk factor for premature and low birth weight babies, some textile companies, in conjunction with their health insurance carriers, have established prenatal managed care programs. A combination of incentives and monitoring encourages workers to get prenatal care. This is believed to be a very cost-effective preventive program.

Another issue, also common to other industries, is the acceptable work week for pregnant employees. Some obstetricians believe that working shifts longer than eight hours or more than 40 hours per week may have an adverse effect on pregnancy. Because many companies have adopted alternative work weeks-10-hour shifts, rotating shifts, and work weeks longer than 40 hours—it is sometimes difficult to accommodate a strict eight-hour shift, or 40-hour work week. These new work schedules also pose some difficulties for employees who are diabetic, have musculoskeletal problems, or are older.

The textile industry has made significant improvements in occupational health during the past 20 years. As with all industry, persisting problems are often subtle. We need to look at the potential problems of our high-tech environment, such as non-ionizing electromagnetic radiation from computers and other machinery. And we need to give increasing attention to the interaction of lifestyle with the work environment.

Pregnancy

Prenatal Care is Essential to Mother and Child A BABY'S LIFE DEPENDS ON IT Prenatal Care Committee

Prenatal Care Committee
Mecklenburg County Medical Society

Obtaining health care during pregnancy can help the motherto-be and her baby in important ways. Here are 10 reasons every pregnant woman should seek prenatal care:

- 1. Early prenatal care is necessary to accurately determine the date of delivery. Women who wait until late in pregnancy to begin prenatal care can only be given an estimated date of delivery.
- 2. Each year, at least 2,000 pregnant women in North Carolina will develop bacteria in their urine but will experience no symptoms. If this condition goes untreated, one-third to one-half of these women will develop a kidney infection. Treatment means hospitalization for several days while receiving intravenous antibiotics. There is also the risk of more serious complications such as premature labor or septic shock.
- Toxemia pregnancy (preeclampsia) is a disease that can be extremely dangerous to the expectant mother without

This article was reprinted with the permission of the Charlotte Observer.

- causing her any pain. Blood pressure measurement and other simple tests during pregnancy are important to detect this condition so that appropriate steps can be taken to protect the health of the mother and her child.
- 4. Some bleeding is normal when giving birth. However, if the mother's blood count is lower than it should be at delivery, she could need a blood transfusion. Even though the American Red Cross blood is as safe as possible, a transfusion does carry a small but real risk for infection if the blood donor was someone other than the woman herself. Prenatal care allows evaluation of the blood count and corrective treatment with medication, if necessary to avoid the need for transfusion.
- Sometimes, the growth of the baby before birth is much less than it should be. Prenatal care can often detect that condition and appropriate treatment can mean a good outcome for the baby.
- 6. The mother's nutrition is especially important in pregnancy. Prenatal care gives the expectant mother an opportunity to learn about her dietary needs and how her nutrition affects the development of her infant. To go one step further, preconceptual counseling about diet can help decrease the risk of birth defects that may be associated with such conditions as diabetes or low folic acid intake.

- 7. Preterm labor and delivery are considered the No. 1 enemy of America's children. Some of the most serious illnesses are due to premature delivery. These illnesses can limit the quality of life for the mother and child for years to come. Prenatal care can reduce the risk of preterm birth.
- 8. Sexually transmitted diseases (STDs) are widespread. In 1992, for instance, there were more than 23,000 cases of gonorrhea in North Carolina alone. Sexually transmitted diseases can cause serious problems for mother and baby. A pregnant woman may be unaware she has a STD, especially in the early stages. Prenatal evaluation and

- treatment for STDs offer a chance to protect the mother and her baby.
- 9. Does the expectant mother smoke? Does she want to talk with a counselor about alcohol? Does she have questions about the effects of alcohol on her pregnancy? Preconceptual care and prenatal care can help with these concerns.
- 10. Anyone whose blood relatives are diabetic has an increased chance of developing diabetes. Pregnancy can cause temporary diabetes (gestational diabetes) in those who have an inherited diabetic risk. Again, a prenatal test can detect this problem so it can be appropriately treated and decrease risk to the mother or infant.

Depression in Pregnancy A FREQUENT PROBLEM THAT IS FREQUENTLY MISSED Carl M. Hoffman, MD

Depression is one of our most common medical problems that, in its mildest form, affects nearly all people at some time in their life. Women are more than twice as likely to be depressed as men.

There are many risk factors for developing depression. These include biochemical factors, serious emotional crisis, loss of self esteem, a history of dependence on other people and perceived loss. Chronic medical conditions and acute, severe or life-threatening illnesses may also lead to an episode of depression.

Stress can overwhelm a person's feelings to the extent that she cannot adequately cope. Even the happiness usually associated with a newborn baby is a form of stress. This so called "good stress" can leave an otherwise healthy mother to a major depression, regardless of whether the pregnancy and delivery were complicated or normal.

Carl Hoffman, MD is an obstetrician-gynecologist with Pinewest OB-GYN, Inc. in High Point.

It is thought that depression is brought on by biochemical imbalances that are inherited. Treatments are available.

Patients with a history of mania may be susceptible to depression. Symptoms of mania are varied and it is rare for one person to exhibit them all. They can include euphoria, a sense of well being, creative thinking, a feeling of being invincible, unexplained hostility, and aggressiveness out of proportion to the situation. People experiencing mania may also require little sleep yet maintain high levels of productive activity. Others report paranoia, psychosis and an increased interest in sex. Pregnant women experiencing these symptoms should seek help from a psychiatrist or someone very experienced in the mental health field.

Some symptoms seem normal

Few doctors have been trained to look for the signs and symptoms of depression in pregnant women. Many of these symptoms are present in pregnant women who are not depressed and who do not have a history of mania or depression, so it's important for women to talk to their doctors about the following signs that could indicate the presence of depression:

mood changes feelings of sadness, emptiness or nervousness low self esteem pessimism difficulty concentrating slower mental thought processes guilt for no reason social withdrawal agitation talking or moving slowly insomnia impaired sex drive lack of energy change in appetite loss of coping skills chronic headaches chronic constination fatigue unusual butterflies in the stomach

If these symptoms recur, the physician will want to rule out physical reasons for them before making the determination that they are psychological and prescribing treatment accordingly.

Some doctors use screening questionnaires on their pregnant patients to determine if they are at higher risk for depression because of past personal history, family history or severe anxiety about their pregnancy. These questionnaires can be helpful in pinpointing a hidden problems and identifying its size before it leads to disastrous results.

About 15 percent of all severely depressed patients commit suicide, 30 times more frequently than the general population. Pregnant women are among those who have a higher risk for suicide.

In order to be treated effectively, depression must be seen as a family problem. The physician and patient must identify for the family specific types of support they can provide to help the woman resolve her depression. A physician may prescribe professional counseling and suggest the woman join a support group. In some cases, when the benefits outweigh the risks, medication may be prescribed to control depression.

The Baby Blues

We are all aware of the phenomenon that many women experience following the birth a child. The so called "baby blues" can occur as a result of the dramatic hormone shift that occurs following delivery to women who had no signs of depression during their pregnancy. This condition usually last a few days and improves daily.

Unfortunately, this sudden change in hormones can cause some women to experience severe depression following the delivery of their child. Left untreated, this can escalate to a point where the woman cannot function day to day. She may have doubts about her abilities as a mother. These doubts may be severe enough to lead her to actions that impair her health and the survival of her newborn. Neglect or destruction of the newborn and suicide of the mother can occur.

It's usually easy to recognize the symptoms of a woman suffering from the baby blues or post-partum depression, as it is called. Unfortunately, the severity of it is often underestimated and treatment may not be sought. Often the family cannot believe that the situation is serious, especially if the pregnancy was uneventful and no history of depression exists. A woman's feelings of despair can be compounded when the family's attention is focused on the baby.

Depending on the degree of a woman's post-partum depression, a physician may recommend intervention by a psychiatrist, support from family members, outpatient counseling or medication until the situation improves to the point that the woman feels she is better and no longer needs help. Good communication between physician and patient is the key to a healthy, happy outcome for mother and baby.

Occupational Risks in the Rubber Industry

Gary N. Greenberg, MD, MPH

The rubber industry combines heavy manufacturing and crude chemical synthesis to create a multitude of products that have become essential to modern life. The complex synthetic process not only yields unique materials, it also causes unique hazards both for those employed in initial manufacture and for those involved in the subsequent development of derivative products.

Historically, the use of natural latex rubber began with the harvest of sap from non-cultivated rubber trees in Amazonia. This material was treated with heat and smoke and then formed into useful products including drinking vessels and shoe soles. In 1839, Charles Goodyear discovered vulcanization, a means of strengthening and stabilizing rubber. This began the increasingly sophisticated chemical engineering process that is the modern rubber industry.

When the supply of natural latex was compromised during World War II, the United States developed synthetic rubber from petroleum sources. ¹ Nowadays, rubber is a petrochemical material, manufactured in huge volumes and with countless end products. Nationwide, many thousands of workers are employed in this broad-based trade² (Table 1, next page), including 36,000 workers in North Carolina in 1992.³ The most significant secondary business (in terms of size of the labor force, volume of production, economic impact, and intensity of exposures) is the manufacture of automobile tires.

In modern American industry, "rubber" has become a generic term referring to many different polymers, all characterized by an ability to stretch and compress while retaining the capacity to return to the original shape. Chemical names for these polymers (called elastomers) reveal the identity of their constituent monomer(s). Styrene-butadiene rubber (SBR rubber) represents 40% of all rubber produced; butadiene rubber (BR or polybutadiene) is the second most abundantly produced type; other types include acrylonitrile-butadiene-styrene (ABS) rubber, polyurethane, and polychloroprene rubber (neoprene).4 The reactive constituents for which these rubbers are named are chosen because they can polymerize with themselves, but that same chemical reactivity means they are also capable of causing biological harm. Most of the monomeric agents are volatile and require critical process controls to prevent injury to production workers.

Toxicology

Monomer toxicity is an aspect of the rubber industry's occupational risks that has led to useful and focused in vitro research. Toxicology profiles of 1,2-butadiene, styrene, and chloropropene are similar: they cause irritation of mucous membranes and respiratory surfaces after low-level exposure and temporary central nervous system effects after moderate exposure. Liver injury has been reported in animals but it is not certain that this effect occurs in humans.

Long-term dangers concern the possible reactions of rubber monomers with biological nucleic acids, producing chromosomal damage and carcinogenic effects. One,2-butadiene is a potent animal carcinogen, but its effects in humans remain controversial. It is less clear that styrene and chloroprene are carcinogenic.

The biological effects of acrylonitrile are distinct from other rubber monomers, which are all reactive hydrocarbons.⁵ It is metabolized to cyanide whose immediate biological consequence is the uncoupling of mitochondrial oxidative phosphorylation (producing cellular asphyxia). Emergency treatment consists of administration of nitrites (which induce methemoglobinemia to sequester cyanide) and sodium thiosulfate (to aid in detoxication of the cyanide). These agents, which are sold together in cyanide antidote kits for urgent (on-site) administration, have saved many lives and represent one of the few real antidotes available in industrial toxicology.

In addition to its monomeric constituents, rubber synthesis requires the introduction of hundreds of chemical additives (Table 2, at right). The resulting recipes have been empirically shown to develop specific attributes that are desirable in the final commercial product. Examples of various vulcanizing additives include antioxidants, activators, retarders, accelerators, flame retardants, blowing agents (to create internal pores), plasticizers, pigments, and extenders. Post-polymerizing additives include release agents (to facilitate removal from molds), and anti-tack agents (to prevent adhesion to rubber surfaces).

The manufacturing process that creates the final rubber polymer also generates heterogeneous, transient, reactive species in varying concentrations. These short-lived chemical agents (and mixtures) have unknown potential health effects that cannot be duplicated in the usual long-range animal feeding or inhalation study.

Steps in the Industrial Production and Use of Rubber

My intent in this article is to increase recognition of the diseases that result from chemical aspects of the rubber manufacturing process, but I do not want to minimize health concerns related to physical dangers. Heat, steam, and pressure pose significant risks in this massive industry. Direct violent injury from unexpected incidents occurring during unguarded machinery operation are the most visible forms of workplace danger and the best opportunity for safety improvement.⁶ Noise exposure represents a physical danger requiring ongoing medical surveillance to prevent significant hearing loss.

Mixing or "compounding" of monomers and dozens or hundreds of vulcanizing agents is the first step in the creation of rubber. It is here that industrial hygiene and process controls have made the greatest difference. These controls include careful materials management, process automation, pre-weighing of ingredients, focused ventilation, and intentional monomer recovery by negative pressure mixing. Nonetheless, this is also the point at which concentrations of all chemical ingredients (as well as their short-lived reaction by-products) are highest. Representatives of nearly every chemical category listed in Table 2 are added to the process at this stage.

"Milling" is a violent heating, grinding, and mixing process that breaks down the form of the initial chemical product to produce sheets of rubber that are then water-cooled. Anti-tack agents are applied as an external coating for easier handling.

Extrusion, spreading, and "calendaring" (a compression process using bowls or rollers) create a functional shape from the rubber sheet. The process involves reforming, cutting, and stretching the rubber for assembly into a useful product. The forceful mechanics represent an obvious opportunity for injury. In addition, the creation of rubber paste or dough uses solvent mixtures (including hexane and naphtha) whose vapors create risks of absorption and toxicity.

Assembly then occurs from the resulting rubber materials, which are molded into the final product (along with non-rubber materials such as steel or fiberglass belts for auto tires), and the assembly is vulcanized or cured. This bakes (sometimes in a pressurized environment) the rubber to complete the cross-reaction of the polymerizing compounds. Health concerns relate to the chemicals applied as release agents and solvents as well as the chemical transients that are emitted in curing fumes.

Finishing is individualized to the actual product. It often involves industrial workers removed from those who do the actual rubber manufacturing. Trimming, cleaning, grinding, and gluing or cementing to other materials occur in hundreds of separate plants, where rubber constituents represent only one component of a complex product. As an example of the dangers posed by final finishing, many of the glues used to successfully bond rubber were sources of widespread exposure to benzene and n-hexane. Fortunately, newer glues usually avoid these toxic ingredients.

Recognized Health Risks for Rubber Workers

Because of the variety of ingredients and secondary chemical agents, most evaluations of rubber industry-related toxicity have necessarily been empirical rather than experimental. Rubber workers have been repeatedly studied for the development of chemical-related illnesses. The most important findings include an excess of malignant disease, clinically significant respiratory damage, and many varieties of specific skin disorders.

Bladder cancer: Historically, the cancer found in greatest excess in rubber workers has been that of the urinary bladder. Data from Britain, and subsequently other nations, showed markedly elevated rates of bladder cancer in rubber workers. Fortunately, these investigations also identified a possible culprit in beta-naphthylamine, an accelerator-antioxidant formerly used in rubber manufacture. This agent is metabolized in vivo to the direct carcinogen nitrosamine. Since beta-naphthylamine has been replaced by other agents, the observed risk of bladder carcinoma has fallen drastically. New studies show that the risk for workers who began their careers since replacement is closer to that of unexposed workers.

Continued concern about bladder cancer is appropriate, though, even in the 1990s. 9.10 Many retired workers (previously exposed to beta-naphthylamine) are still alive and need to be monitored for the development of bladder cancer. Diagnosis of this malignancy at an early stage is closely linked to morbidity and mortality outcome, so screening these individuals is useful and potentially life-saving. Urine cytology screening of exposed workers has shown better case survival, but not yet shown reduced overall mortality.

Epidemiological data continue to show lesser but still positive excesses of bladder cancer among workers who were notexposed to beta-naphthylamine. Other bi-cyclic aromatic amines and other agents with known bladder cancer effects (4'-Methylene-bis-[2-chloroaniline] or MOCA) are still heavily used, with potential for continued neoplastic results.

Stomach cancer: Increased risk for stomach cancer11 may have several sources. The excess rates of this cancer found in workers involved in the early stages of the rubber manufacturing process seem to be related to particulates generated in the chemical reaction and the violent mixing of rubber pieces (compounding, mixing, and milling). The carcinogenic chemicals are likely to be carbon black, curing fumes (containing unnamed reactive intermediates), and nitrosamines. Later in the production chain, mineral fibers with asbestos-like properties may be used in rubber product manufacture, and these may have malignant potential.

Other cancers: Newer studies continue to show an excess of malignancies among rubber workers. Of particular concern are the repeated findings of elevated rates of hematological cancer, especially myelogenous and lymphocytic leukemia.¹² The most obvious explanation is the previous use of benzene (a well-recognized leukemogen), but even without exposure to benzene rubber workers have an above-normal leukemia risk. Possibly this is a result of the fact that, although pure benzene is not used because of health dangers, it often forms a low concentration contaminant of other aromatic solvents.

It remains possible that other gastrointestinal cancers (especially of the esophagus and colon) are work-related even in modern rubber workers. Continued but varied excess rates for these cancers have been found, usually in sub-groups of studied populations. Suggestions of elevated risks for lymphoma, and cancer of the lung, prostate, brain, thyroid, and pancreas have been less consistently noted.¹³

The International Agency for Research on Cancer reviews potential chemical links to human cancers. Because of the myriad chemical agents involved, it reviewed the risks of working in the rubber manufacturing industry as a single potential carcinogen. It classified the data regarding risk of leukemia from rubber-making

It also concluded that, for workers entering the industry after 1950, there was "no clear evidence" of increased bladder cancer risk. The evidence for a causal role in skin, stomach, and lung cancer was called "limited," and that linking rubber manufacture to cancers of prostate, colon, brain, thyroid, pancreas, and lymphoma was found "inadequate."

"Among workers exposed to asbestos... primary lung cancer and mesothelioma are recognized consequences."

Respiratory Disease

Since the rubber industry uses talc and other asbestos-like materials, it is not surprising that pulmonary abnormalities have been related to this work. Among workers exposed to asbestos (whether added to rubber products or used as insulation surrounding plant equipment) primary lung cancer and mesothelioma are recognized consequences. The amorphous silica mentioned in Table 2 is distinct from the much more pathological crystalline silica; it is not thought to produce pneumoconioses or pulmonary fibrosis.

Curing fumes and carbon black are potential causes for respiratory irritation and the risks of chronic bronchitis are elevated in rubber workers. Other causes of pulmonary and upper respiratory inflammation include antimony trioxide (a flame retardant additive) and peroxide-based vulcanization agents.

Diisocyanates (most commonly toluene diisocyanate, TDI), used in the preparation of polyurethane rubber, are particularly hazardous. These chemicals are powerful sensitizers and irritants. Once workers have been sensitized, exposure to concentrations of less than 1 ppb can produce severe asthma. The response is thought to be immunologically mediated, explaining the biological magnification of response to such small doses. Avoiding even transient high-dose exposures may prevent workers' sensitization.

Dermatological Disease

The heat, caustic materials, and high volumes of defatting solvents used in manufacturing represent cutaneous physical hazards in rubber-making as in other industries. Beyond this, rubber itself represents an unimaginably complex combination of agents capable of inducing skin reactivity. Many of the reactive compounds used in the preparation of certain rubbers are well-recognized causes for cutaneous damage.¹⁴

Dermatologists can often diagnose the specific type of rubber-induced contact dermatitis. Special patch test kits (prepared according to the International Contact Dermatitis Research Group's recommendations) include testing materials to detect hypersensitivity to paraphenylenediamine, mercaptobenzothiazole, and the thiuram agents. Many of these compounds show immunological cross reactivity with other commercial products, which may explain the sometimes confusing clinical histories of reaction to non-rubber materials.

In addition to the irritant and hypersensitivity reactions to the chemical agents used in rubber manufacture, some phenols and hydroquinones are capable of local chemical interference with pigment production, resulting in leukoderma. This patchy vitiligo is distinct because its location directly corresponds to the site of cutaneous deposition of the causative compounds.

Neurological Disease

Each of the lipophilic and volatile chemicals used as monomers or as additives in the manufacture of rubber can produce temporary symptoms of drunkenness and stupor. This dose-dependent, anesthesialike membrane effect represents a physical, not a metabolic phenomenon. There is great controversy regarding the mechanism and prevalence of permanent neurological injury in workers exposed to repeated doses of organic solvent vapors. In some nations, any solvent-exposed worker with any illness of the central nervous system (including depression) may be classified as having solvent encephalopathy. Many American toxicologists require evidence of "organic" neurological findings as well as a history of repeated high-dose exposures (resulting in recurrent acute toxic effects).

Less controversial are the effects of n-hexane. This linear alkane and its metabolites bind to the neurofilaments necessary for axonal transport, resulting in distal deterioration of long axons. The peripheral neuropathy of affected patients is clinically identical to diabetic and alcoholic peripheral nerve disease, with stocking/glove dysesthesia and anesthesia, but rare motor dysfunction.

"There is controversy about the prevalence of neurological injury in workers exposed to repeated doses of organic solvent vapors."

Summary

Important epidemiologic findings have resulted in safer work conditions over the past decades. Maintaining this improvement in worker risk requires continued epidemiological surveillance for unrecognized dangers and intense enforcement of industrial hygiene principles. It also demands an enhanced clinical suspicion and a low threshold for clinical diagnosis of potentially attributable health problems in workers whose workplace chemical environment is in continual evolution. Clinicians should be familiar with the known associations of work and disease, and remain alert to the possibility of chemically mediated disease in workers exposed to this highly complex mixture of chemical agents.

Health Aspects of the North Carolina Electronics Industry

Dennis J. Darcey, MD, MPH, and Joyce M. Young, MD, MPH

The rapid growth and advancement of technology in our society has brought along with it a rapid growth in microelectronies and semiconductor manufacturing. The electronics manufacturing industry in North Carolina employs an estimated 16,000 workers. This constitutes only a small fraction of the state's workforce, but it shows that electronic manufacturing has become an important industry here, one that is likely to grow in the future.

This large and diverse industry includes the fabrication and assembly of semiconductors, electronic components, and commercial and industrial electronic products. By "fabrication" we mean the manufacturing of semiconductors and printed circuit boards; by "assembly," we mean the placement and wiring of ehips onto circuit boards or "cards," the inspection and testing of eards with chips attached ("populated" eards), and the joining of populated cards to appropriate components, housing, and monitors to produce finished computers and other electronic products.

Despite the potential for exposure to various hazards, the electronics industry has consistently had a lower rate of injury and illness than is found in general manufacturing: 4.8 events/100 full-time workers vs. 12.7.2 This lower rate reflects, at least in part, the electronics industry's awareness of special hazards and the institution of safeguards to protect workers and ensure workplace safety.

The Nature of Electronics Manufacturing

Familiarity with the elements of electronic production work can help health care providers determine whether certain health conditions are work-related and help them make appropriate recommendations regarding work tasks. We review those elements briefly here:

Semiconductor fabrication: Integrated circuits are fashioned on thin substrates—usually of silicon dioxide—through a process of oxidation, photo-etching, and diffusion. A small wafer of silicon is oxidized, then coated with a polymer (photoresist) that resists ultraviolet photographic light. A pattern of circuits is photographed onto the photoresist surface and chemicals are applied to etch the photographic pattern into the silicon oxide. A solvent bath washes away the photoresist leaving the etched pattern. Highly conductive chemicals are then diffused into the patterned wafer to produce a conductive circuit. This etching and diffusion process may be repeated several times, yielding intricate layers of circuits. When all steps are completed, the wafer is cut into "chips." Similar processes are used to create printed circuit boards.

Potential health hazards arise from the many chemicals, light, and radiation used in manufacturing. High levels of automation greatly reduce the hazards for operators; tool maintenance and setup personnel often run the greater risk.

Electronic card assembly and test: During assembly, 50 to 150 chips are populated or "stuffed" onto printed circuit boards or eards. Attaching these chips may involve punching, snapping, stapling, or plugging the wire leads into place, after which they are usually machine soldered. Completed cards are visually inspected and electronically tested to ensure circuit completion and accuracy. Defective components are removed, replaced, and hand-soldered into place.

Final product assembly and distribution: Completed electronic cards are attached to other components and structural materials to produce the final product. For example, computer assembly involves snapping cards onto platforms in the computer housing, screwing and wiring in place components such as disk drives and control panels, loading software, testing the assembled device, and fastening appropriate panels. Completed products are then packed for distribution and shipping.

Health Hazards of Electronics Manufacturing

Assembly and test: The hazards common to general manufacturing-falls, lifting injuries, lacerations—exist in the electronics industry. In addition, specialized tasks may require use of the upper extremities, leading to a potential for musculoskeletal injuries when proper ergonomic principles are not followed. Populating cards and assembling computers and monitors require that operators use their hands and arms to place components on cards and attach necessary parts. Parts may be small, requiring close handeye coordination and manipulation of items in tight spaces. Employees performing these tasks may repeat a single operation a number of times. Risk factors include the need to exert force, repetition of movement, potential for awkward postures, improper use of hand tools, short recovery time, and pressure to meet production schedules.

In 1992, 89,000 cases of repetitive motion injury were reported to the Bureau of Labor Statistics; 5% involved the manufacturing of electronic equipment.2 Repetitive trauma disorders make up 3.5% of the occupational illnesses and injuries reported to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and cumulative trauma disorders of the wrist (tendinitis, tenosynovitis, DeQuervain's disease, and carpal tunnel syndrome) are the most common of these.2 Wrist extension and flexion, wrist flexion in the pinch and grasp postures, or improper use of hand tools may serve as risk factors. Employees performing electronic card inspection and testing may complain of muscle fatigue and spasm if they maintain static positions while performing their assigned tasks.

A few employees who perform soldering tasks report dermatological and respiratory complaints, but these are minimized because most soldering is done by automated processes such as the wave solder machine. Health complaints related to irritation from the solder flux include: eye, nose, and throat irritation; chest tightness, wheezing and occasional asthma; and mild facial rashes or irritant contact dermatitis of the hands. Rosin, the flux most commonly used in electronics industry, is a complex mixture of diterpene acids. It can cause allergic contact dermatitis, airborne contact dermatitis, and allergic contact urticaria. These conditions, however, are rarely reported, probably because symptoms are usually short-lived and disappear rapidly after removal from the exposure.

Electronics manufacturing generally utilizes a lead/tin alloy solder containing approximately 40% lead. Low temperature, soft soldering operations do not generate lead oxide fume, and workbench dust samples show very low lead levels. Measurements of blood lead levels in long-term solderers show no increase in lead levels over non-exposed groups. On the other hand, those who maintain and repair soldering machines do need precautions to control lead exposure. Removing spent solder can produce high concentrations of airborne lead dust; skin and garment contamination that can result in excess ingestion. Good house-keeping and respiratory protection are required during these operations.

Fiberglass-reinforced printed circuit boards can be a source of easily detached fiberglass spicules. These spicules can cause irritant dermatitis by direct penetration into the skin of fibers exceeding 4.5 μ in diameter.⁴

Semiconductor production: The semiconductor industry is called a "clean industry," but it is actually one of the most chemically intensive since it involves the use of thousands of different chemicals. Engineering controls and work practices limit the exposure of workers in large US manufacturing firms, but potential hazards remain and must be recognized when assessing individual patients (Table 1, next page). We discuss these potential hazard by type.

Solvents-Organic solvents are the chemicals most often used by the microelectronics industry. Alcohols (ethanol, methanol, propanol), aromatic hydrocarbons (toluene and xylene), halogenated hydrocarbons (freon, methylene chloride, 1,1,1-trichloroethane, trichloroethylene, chloroform, perchlorethylene), and glycol ethers are used as degreasers, diluents, cleaners, and chemical reactants. The industry uses highly efficient ventilation systems to protect semiconductors from dust contamination, but these filtration systems do not remove organic solvent vapors. Accidentally released solvent vapors can be recirculated throughout the semiconductor manufacturing areas, but are usually quickly diluted by the high air flows.

Being lipid soluble, organic solvents can cause defatting of the skin. They can be absorbed through the skin, but inhalation is the more common route of exposure. Nasal and eye irritation and sinus congestion can result from excessive exposure to solvent vapors. Acute exposures to high levels of many solvents can cause headache, fatigue, somnolence, and incoordination. Existing standards of occupational exposure are calculated to minimize these effects.

Airborne levels of organic solvents in the electronics industry are generally well below exposure limits. However, studies from other industries have linked exposure to volatile organic solvents with a number of adverse health effects. Among these is a "psycho-organic syndrome" of fatigue, difficulty concentrating, memory Rare effects of excessive exposure to organic solvents include polyneuro-pathy (from hexane and methyl-n-butyl ketone); trigeminal neuropathy (trichloroethylene); vestibular dysfunction (alcohols); cardiac arrhythmias (chlorinated solvents); hemolysis (glycol ethers); and liver damage (chlorinated solvents).

Some, but not all, epidemiologic studies suggest that women exposed to mixed organic solvents and glycol ethers have a slightly increased incidence of spontaneous abortion. In spite of the uncertain risk, the Semiconductor Manufacturers Association has recommended removal of some suspect compounds (particularly glycol ethers).

Plastics and resins—Most modern photoresists are derived from plastic polymers, such as vinyl chloride and styrene. Resins used in photoresists include isoprenes, polyisoprenes, and polybutadienes. Cyclized natural and synthetic rubbers are also used, and some resin resist formulations include phthalates as plasticizers. Other photoresist formulations use urethanes, bisphenol-epoxy ethers, polyesters, styrol acrylates, and phenol formaldehyde resins. Tetrahydrofuran, epichlorohydrin, and acrylonitrile have been employed when ionic photoinitiators are used. Acrylonitrile is a potent cyanogen and can cause cyanide intoxication. Virtually all of these materials are skin and respiratory irritants and some can cause sensitization. Some are also known nervous system depressants, hepatotoxins, nephrotoxins, and potential carcinogens.

Acids/corrosives—A variety of acids, oxidizing agents, and corrosives are used in the chemical baths that etch microcircuit patterns onto the silicon wafer. Concentrations of these compounds vary from dilute solutions used at etch stations to highly concentrated cleaning solutions. In recent years the use of automated feed and disposal systems has reduced manual handling of these materials, and dedicated ventilation exhaust of acid baths has further reduced exposures. Now maintenance personnel and chemical handlers are generally at higher risk of exposures than operators.

Workers in the semiconductor industry have been burned by nitric, hydrochloric, sulfuric, phosphoric, and hydrofluoric acids. Hydrofluoric acid is especially dangerous because it can penetrate lipid barriers to reach deeper layers of skin and subcutaneous tissues. Because dilute solutions are used in the microelectronics industry, skin exposure to hydrofluoric acid may go unnoticed for hours (until pain occurs as deeper structures are penetrated). Accidental skin exposure and inhalation of hydrofluoric acid can induce fatal cardiac arrhythmias due to hypocalcemia (the absorbed fluoride binds circulating calcium).

Toxic gases—Toxic gases are among the most dangerous materials used in the manufacture of semiconductor devices. The storage, handling, and disposal of these gases pose a major potential hazard to workers and even to communities surrounding manufacturing plants. The commonly used gases are arsine, diborane, and phosphine. They are deposited by diffusion and ion implantation onto the semiconductor crystal to form the electrical junctions that control the flow of electrons in the circuitry. Workers may be exposed to gases during the handling of gas cylinders or the cleaning of furnaces and ion implanters. Exposure is limited by use of sophisticated engineering and ventilation designs and by the use of continuous gas monitoring systems that automatically sound an alarm if gas release occurs. These alarms trigger evacuation of the manufacturing area.

Gas exposure can cause eye, nose and throat, and upper respiratory tract irritation. The most serious effect is pulmonary edema, the onset of which may be delayed until 24-36 hours after exposure. Phosphine causes more lower respiratory effects than either arsine or diborane. Arsine is less irritating and has a slight garlicky odor, but it is the most acutely toxic form of arsenic. Exposure to concentrations as low as 25-50 ppm for only 30 minutes can be lethal. Acute renal failure caused by a massive hemolysis is an early and often fatal complication of arsine poisoning, but it is also toxic to the heart, lungs, liver, gastrointestinal tract, central nervous system, and bone marrow. Diborane is acutely irritating to the upper respiratory tract, eyes, nose, and throat. The silane gas used to deposit silicon is not an irritant but it can act as an asphyxiant. It is also pyrophoric, capable of burning on contact with air.

Metals—Lead, nickel, chromium, and cadmium are used in electroplating, etching, bonding, and metallizing. Exposures can result from skin contact or from inhalation of metal dusts and metal oxide fumes. Manufacturing processes generally use effective local ventilation, but when overexposure does occur, heavy metals may damage the central and peripheral nervous system (lead), the kidneys (cadmium, lead), and skin (allergic responses to nickel, chromium). Nickel and chromium exposure have been associated with lung cancer.

Clinical Evaluation

Assembly and test: Tenosynovitis typically presents with pain in the region of the affected tendon(s). Pain increases with movement of the tendon; there may be soft tissue swelling and occasionally crepitance as the tendon moves within its sheath. DeQuervain's tenosynovitis causes pain and swelling at the radial side of the wrist. Finkelstein's (pain in the first dorsal compartment of the hand on passive flexion of the thumb and adduction of the wrist) may be positive.

The symptoms of carpal tunnel syndrome include pain in the wrist, hand, and forearm; nocturnal pain; and numbness and paresthesias in median nerve distribution of the affected hand. Physical signs include pain on movement, and positive tests for Tinel's (pain and tingling in the distribution of the median nerve on percussion over the carpal tunnel), and/or Phalen's (pain and tingling in the distribution of the median nerve when both wrists are hyperflexed for one minute against resistance). Nerve conduction studies can establish the diagnosis of nerve entrapment syndromes like carpal tunnel syndrome.

It is crucial to determine the degree to which any disorder is work-related. A detailed description of the patient's work tasks is therefore necessary. It is also important to consider non-occupational activities that involve use of the upper extremities and other medical conditions that can cause musculoskeletal symptoms. Treatments include rest, anti-inflammatory agents, judicious immobilization, physical therapy, corticosteroid injections, and surgery. Early and appropriate treatment may prevent progression of the condition and loss of function.

Irritant dermatitis stemming from soldering or fiberglass exposure typically causes itching, erythema, vesicles, and excoriation. Initial treatment is symptomatic and ultimate resolution comes from preventing exposure through use of protective coverings like gloves or emollients and good personal hygiene. It is rare for solder or fiberglass to act as a skin sensitizer.

Wheezing or chest tightness may be the main respiratory complaints of solderers. Exposure may be acute or chronic, and the symptoms may be a result of irritation, sensitization, or both. Some individuals develop asthma from exposure to the fumes of rosin-cored solder. The tie to work needs to be established. and measurement of peak expiratory flow or spirometry may document that lung function is different at work and at home. Removal from the source often results in symptom improvement although asthma symptoms may persist. Non-occupational exposure to some of the same acids that are present in solder flux (from cigarette smoke, paints, and hairsprays) may provide ongoing provocation. A variety of effective methods are available to extract solder fumes from machines, solder pots, and individual solder irons. Proper engineering control of fume release is required and individual respiratory protection devices should not be substituted.

Semiconductor production: Clinical evaluation of occupational illness and injury in semiconductor manufacturing is complicated by the myriad of chemicals and processes and their rapid change as technology advances. Clinicians who see injured workers should arrange for a thorough site visit to better understand the work environment. Initial evaluation of the patient requires a comprehensive occupational history and review of Material Safety Data sheets that describe the chemicals used in the work area. Company safety representatives can often provide crucial information regarding the nature of the exposure.

Assessing exposures to organic solvents, toxic gases, metals, plastics, and resins requires some estimate of the dose. It is possible to measure either the parent compound or a metabolite of a number of these chemicals in serum or urine. Such assays can also be used for medical surveillance of populations exposed to these compounds. Timing of sample collection is often critical, especially for volatile organic solvents that may have a biological half-life of only a few hours. Treatment of exposure is usually supportive; many of the chemicals used in the industry have no specific treatment.

The rate of occupational illness in the electronics industry is less than the rate of illness for all manufacturing, yet the rate of respiratory illness secondary to chemical agents is higher than that scen in general manufacturing. Many of the acids and corrosives, solvents, plastics, metals, and toxic gases used are acute upper and lower respiratory irritants. Some of the acid mists and toxic gases can cause delayed onset pulmonary edema, so patients should be monitored for 24-36 hours following exposure, even if not initially symptomatic.

Following arsine exposure, acute hemolysis should be suspected and renal function measured to assess the extent of kidney damage. Liver transaminases may be elevated following exposure to chlorinated solvents. Exposure to acrylonitrile can lead to cyanide poisoning. A cyanide poisoning kit should be available for use by rescue squads, clinics, and emergency rooms. Methylene chloride is metabolized to carbon monoxide and assessment of exposure to this solvent should include a carboxyhemoglobin level to estimate both the severity of exposure and the need for supplemental oxygen or hyperbaric treatment.

Skin exposures to many compounds, particularly plastics and resins, can cause irritant or allergic contact dermatitis. Treatment consists of removal from exposure, better skin protection, and topical or systemic corticosteroid therapy.

Initial treatment of acid and corrosive burns consists of aggressive decontamination of the skin with water for at least 15 minutes. If the worker complains of continuing pain following hydrofluoric acid exposure, a topical quaternary ammonia compound or 2.5% calcium gluconate gel can be applied. For more severe exposures, a 5%-10% solution of calcium gluconate can be infused directly into the injured tissue. For severe digit burns, intra-arterial injection of calcium gluconate has been used in a hospital setting. All hydrofluoric burns require assessment by a physician to avoid the rare but potentially fatal complications of systemic fluoride poisoning.

Prevention

Prevention of exposure to solvents, plastics, metals, and toxic gases is most often achieved through engineering controls and isolation of hazardous processes although personal protective barriers such as chemical resistant aprons and gloves have their place. Sophisticated exhaust ventilation systems and chemical fume hoods are widely used in semiconductor manufacturing, particularly in "clean rooms" where toxic gases are used and stored. These systems automatically monitor gas concentrations, and are equipped with alarms to trigger evacuation of personnel in the event of contamination.

Prevention of injury and illness in any industry involves eliminating risks and protecting workers. In addition to minimizing exposure to toxic materials, proper job task design can limit force requirement and repetitive motion. Where scientific evidence has not yet demonstrated clear cause and effect or established exposure limits, common sense and a prudent approach to job design will minimize risk.

Occupational Mental Health

Evolving Strategies for a Rapidly Changing World

Craig R. Stenberg, PhD, and Patricia J. Gammon, PhD

Dramatic changes are taking place in the workplace, not only in the United States, but worldwide. Restructuring of organizations has left few sectors of the global economy untouched. Those in medical and allied medical professions are acutely aware of the transitions brought about by private sector ventures into "managed care" and public sector efforts at medical care system reform. These changes effect not only the way we work, but how we feel about our work, our workplaces, our colleagues, and ourselves.

As organizations restructure, individuals and families feel the economic and emotional effects. Traditional relationships change—sometimes for the better as when employees truly feel empowered to excel, but often not, as when changes erode the trust between individuals and organizations. Morale may be affected as much for those who survive as for those who lose their jobs. Employees who remain after "restructuring" often take on additional responsibilities, work longer hours, and face chronic job insecurity.

The demographic composition of the working population continues to change. American workplaces are becoming increasingly heterogenous. Organizations vary widely in how they approach age, ethnic, and gender diversity. The workplace is a major arena within which societal tensions are played out; it creates enormous challenges to prevent and redress age, ethnic, and gender discrimination as well as sexual harassment. In addition, individual workers must balance the sometimes conflicting demands of work and family. How all these conflicts are resolved has substantial implications for job design, employee morale and productivity, marital stability, childrearing, and elder care. These, in turn, have profound impacts on the communities in which we live. This is the arena of occupational mental health.

Dr. Stenberg is Assistant Clinical Professor in the Divisions of Medical Psychology and Occupational and Environmental Medicine, and is Director of the Occupational Mental Health Program, Duke University Medical Center. Dr. Gammon is an Occupational Mental Health Professional in Duke's Division of Occupational and Environmental Medicine, Durham 27710.

What is Occupational Mental Health?

Historically, Occupational Medicine has concerned itself with health and safety in the workplace. Increasingly, its focus has been extended to consider how human factors affect health and safety as well as how work environments affect the cognitive, social, motivational, and emotional facets of individual workers. Occupational Mental Health is a growing field, one that emphasizes assessment, prevention, and intervention to promote the psychological well-being of employees.

Recently, an expert panel convened by the National Institute of Occupational Health and Safety and the American Psychological Association established the following goals for the field of Occupational Mental Health: I) The enhancement of employee work performance. 2) The improvement of the overall health and well-being of the workforce. 3) The reduction of health care costs through decreased health care use.²

Professional services that may help achieve these goals include:

- · Stress management programs and support groups.
- Consultation for managers and supervisors to deal more effectively with troubled employees, and to devise strategies to improve the rapport of management and workers.
- Employee Assistance Programs (EAPs), including assessment and counseling for employees and family members.
- Occupational crisis management teams to provide debriefings for employees effected by trauma in the workplace.
- Training for supervisors and employees on topics such as conflict resolution, team building, communication skills, managing transitions, and signs and symptoms of substance abuse.
- Evaluation of individuals and groups through "fitness for duty evaluations," psychological needs assessments, and stress inventories.
- Benefit plans that give incentives for wellness-oriented behavior.
- Helping organizations identify and modify organizationally created stress (through job redesign, shift scheduling, selfpaced work, micro-breaks, and self-directed work teams).

 Helping minimize the negative effects of organizational reorganization or downsizing (by encouraging fair and just job selection programs that predict subsequent performance; by designing outplacement and job retraining services; by conducting survivor groups for employees who are retained).

Do We Need Occupational Mental Health Services?

Psychological and substance abuse problems are exceedingly common. A recent study of non-institutionalized persons aged 15 to 54 predicts that almost half (48%) of Americans will have at least one psychiatric disorder in their lifetime, and one in every six will have three or more comorbid disorders.3 The number of persons suffering from substance dependence is difficult to measure, since those affected usually try to convince themselves that they do not have a problem and (family members and coworkers sometimes collude in this pattern of denial). Perhaps as many as 10%-15% of the working population will satisfy diagnostic criteria for substance dependence at some point in their lives (the rates are even higher rates in workforces with a preponderance of men). Taken together, psychological and substance abuse problems significantly reduce worker efficiency, accounting for many absences from work and disability claims.4

Diagnosable mental illnesses exact a major toll in the workplace. Anxiety and depression are the two most common psychiatric disorders in America. Anxiety disorders have a lifetime prevalence of about 25% of the population; depressive disorders, about 15% of males and 24% of females. Depression and other emotional disorders seem to be increasing in frequency and having younger ages of onset.5 Psychoses such as schizophrenia and other thought disorders, although occurring less often than anxiety and depression, can dramatically impair a worker's ability to function on the job, affecting the will to work as well as cognitive skills such as concentration, problem solving, abstract reasoning, and judgment. Personality disorders are more prevalent than psychotic disorders, and can affect an individual's ability to relate to others. Workers with personality disorders can be troublesome to manage because of the likelihood of conflicts with co-workers and supervisors.

Alcohol and drug abuse problems also pose significant obstacles to a healthy workplace environment. Just last year McCarthy, Kissling, and Dirkers estimated that more than 450,000 individuals need substance abuse treatment in North Carolina alone! Approximately 75% of them are currently employed, but many will suffer significant impairment of their ability to function on the job due to addiction. Inevitable outcomes of untreated substance abuse are impaired job performance, disability, accidents, need for hospitalization and expensive medical care, and increased risk for criminal behavior and violence in the workplace. The bottom line is that the effects of alcohol and drug abuse ripple through the workplace. Ignoring the problem only compounds it.

Mental health and substance abuse problems afflict all workers. A study of corporate managers and professionals found the lifetime prevalences of depression in men and women professionals to be 23% and 36% respectively. The most common forms of impairment in executives are due to substance abuse, depression, and bipolar disorder. Among hourly workers, depression, anxiety disorders, substance abuse, psychoses, and personality disorders are most prevalent. Despite the prevalence of these disorders, only a small number of impaired individuals seek professional assistance, and when they do, they cite a variety of health complaints but rarely report depressive symptoms.

Untreated mental health disorders are very costly. Counting reduced or lost productivity, law enforcement, and preventable health care expenditures, mental illness and substance abuse cost the US economy at least $273 billion every year. This extraordinary figure creates incentives for organizations to direct resources toward prevention and treatment.

The Americans with Disabilities Act, enacted in 1990, places increased responsibility on employers to make appropriate adjustments for the special needs of those with physical or mental disabilities, or substance abuse-related problems. This law substantially increases the need for professional advice and assistance in making necessary adjustments. For instance, individuals with chronic mental disorders such as autism who can work at tasks like library cataloging but have substantial impairment in social functioning require significant modifications of demands that they interact with patrons.

The Drug Free Workplace Act of 1988 also fostered the growth of occupational mental health programming. It requires employees of the government and of firms under federal contract to have access to EAP services.¹²

How Do Mental Health Professionals Contribute?

EAPs were developed to help employees suffering from alcoholism retain their jobs. Early programs were primarily modeled after Alcoholics Anonymous, but in the 1970s and 1980s, as employers began to recognize the effect of alcohol, drug, and mental health problems on the workforce, the role of EAPs began to expand. Between 1980 and 1990, the number of employed American workers who had access to EAPs rose from 12% to 34%.¹²

EAPs operate on the principal that both the employer's and the employee's best interests are served when persons whose personal or family problems might impact job performance get help as early as possible. EAP counselors are the liaison between companies and the broad range of professional and selfhelp treatment options available. They help individuals link up with appropriate resources, using a number of components.

Initially, an EAP policy must be developed and integrated with other personnel policies such as drug and alcohol and disciplinary procedures. Through initial and ongoing training and consultation, EAP programs teach supervisors how to identify employees at risk, the procedures for making referrals to the EAP, the need for confidentiality, legal concerns, and other factors important to the effectiveness of the program. Employee orientations are used to describe the EAP benefit, and informational brochures and periodic "brown bag" talks on topics such as managing stress are usually provided. Employees are encouraged to call for an appointment if they or a family member have marital, psychological, substance abuse, parent/child, stress, financial, legal, or other problems. The specific clinical services offered usually include assessment and referral. Increasingly, EAP programs are providing short-term counseling, 24-hour telephone crisis counseling, case tracking, and program evaluation.

Confidentiality is the cornerstone of an effective EAP. EAP services are often sold on a capitated basis and employers are given only general statistical reports about the numbers of persons using the service. Employers are given no information that might identify a particular client. Most EAP inquiries come from self-referral or as a result of peer recommendations. However, management can use EAPs when an employee's performance becomes a problem. Supervisors may encourage an employee to seek help through the EAP as an important step in addressing the problem. In such instances, after appropriate written releases, the EAP may provide the organization with information about the dates and times of appointments, whether the employee is complying with treatment, and whether there are specific recommendations for the workplace setting. Diagnostic or other personal information is not discussed. However, the EAP is not a "safe haven" in which employees may escape appropriate discipline for poor performance, nor are employees disciplined or terminated because they fail to comply with the EAP. Decisions about those matters are based on employees' workplace behavior.

Recently EAPs have been criticized for not sufficiently protecting confidentiality, ¹³ and some programs have been criticized for tolerating conflicts of interest resulting from financial relationships with long-term treatment providers or insurers (which can bias referral patterns). Nevertheless, a well-designed program can protect confidentiality better than third-party benefit systems since no identifying information is disclosed to the company, insurer, third-party administrator, or others. Financial conflict of interest can be controlled by policies that prohibit the EAP from referring clients to any resource in which they have a financial stake and by carefully monitoring referral patterns.

EAPs are now often involved in the development and implementation of stress management programs, wellness programs, supervisor/employee conflict resolution, advice on management style, and when traumas have occurred at work, in critical incident debriefings. More recent roles, based on better financial management of health care costs, relate to the emergence of EAPs as case managers or gatekeepers for mental health and substance abuse care and their potential involvement in disability or stress-related compensation cases.

Psychological Treatment of Work Dysfunctions

An individual's function at work can be influenced by his or her work preferences, abilities, personality, and values. It can also be effected by various features of the external work environment and, inevitably, by the interaction between individual and environmental factors. Surprisingly, there have been few attempts to identify the common work-related dysfunctions or to study treatment approaches. In 1993 Lowman, in his book on counseling for work-related dysfunctions, took some initial steps. He delineated and provided appropriate therapeutic interventions for a range of work problems (work-related anxiety and depression, underachievement, job burn-out, "work-aholism") which can profoundly influence an individual's work function and satisfaction.¹⁴

Occupational and Personal Stress

According to the International Labor Organization, job-related stress has reached epidemic proportions among both bluecollar and white-collar workers. 15 Besides costing the US some $200 billion annually, a substantial body of research supports the view that stress and stressful life events significantly affect health. This research has focused on two primary areas: 1) environmental factors producing stress, and 2) personality traits associated with vulnerability to stress. Environmental factors include job strain—excessive work, conflicting demands, or insufficient time to complete tasks. Workers who have some control or discretion over their work process exhibit fewer stress-related effects. So, too, do workers who get work breaks (or other stress reducing interventions) appropriately tailored to the work setting. The personality variable most clearly associated with stress-related illness is found in some highly driven persons with "type A" personality (those who exhibit traits of hostility and cynicism and who are at increased risk for coronary heart disease).16

Many companies, for financial and altruistic reasons, recognize the importance of helping employees develop effective coping strategies. Contemporary models of occupational stress focus on the fit of workers into the workplace environment. Since this fit is a source of stress, intervention is possible at a variety of levels. Stress-resilient workers can be matched to high-stress jobs, individual worker's capacity to deal with stressors and problems can be strengthened, and the stressful components of the workplace environment can be decreased. Stress management consultants advocate a comprehensive approach to assessment, treatment, and prevention of stress in employees, their families, and the organization. Such an approach requires a multidisciplinary team. Individual interventions consist of fitness programs, relaxation training, counseling, and wellness-oriented medical care; organizational interventions consist of problem detection through surveys, interviews, or both; training managers to develop a responsive leadership style; and job redesign to give workers enhanced control, improved communication, and enriched work experience.¹⁷

Workplace Violence

No media events alert public attention to mental health issues in the workplace like the episodic but dramatic incidents of workplace violence. With each new incident, the issue comes "closer to home"—as in the traumatizing shooting at the Sumitomo plant in Research Triangle Park in April 1994 (Fig. 1). A similar tragedy occurred at the nearby IBM plant in 1982.

In 1992, there were I,004 homicides in the US; during the preceding decade it was the third-most common cause of death in the workplace. Almost one-quarter (24%) of those killed were managerial oradministrative support personnel. In 1992, 110,000 acts of violence in the workplace cost employers more than $4 billion. In 1993, homicides at work became the second-leading cause of death, accounting for 21% of all workplace fatalities. Workers in commercial settings where money is exchanged appear to be at highest risk.

Violent acts are often perpetrated by disgruntled employees or former employees, or by angry spouses or boyfriends of workers. Organizational "postmortems" may reveal that the work environment had devalued employees or that management was unpredictable and unresponsive to employee concerns. Workers, however, need not be too worried about becoming targets since the odds of coworker-to-coworker violence is still less than the risk of being struck by lightning.²⁰

Currently, there is very little scientific research on workplace violence. It is important, therefore, to identify profiles of individuals and organizations at increased risk for violence. Job loss or a history of violent behavior or substance abuse appear to increase the risk of violence, but no measures have a high degree of sensitivity and specificity. Consequently, prevention focuses on broad-spectrum interventions, helping organizations develop and publicize policies prohibiting violent or threatening behavior, training supervisors and other managers to identify and de-escalate potentially volatile situations, and improving access to EAP resources.

Management and security staff can benefit from continuing education in these areas. Counselors can serve as facilitators and mediators, using techniques developed to facilitate communication in couples' and family therapy. Consultants can also help when organizations contemplate relocations, layoffs, reor-ganizations, or other changes. Preventive planning can anticipate and address the stresses of transition and minimize the negative impact of inevitable change.

Critical Incident Stress Debriefings

Violence is not the only trauma that occurs in the workplace. Individuals may be injured on a construction job, become acutely ill or die suddenly in an office setting, or, like police, fire, rescue, and emergency medical personnel, regularly face life-threatening traumas. Co-workers and other survivors who witness tragedy are often left to deal on their own with the troubling emotions clicited. The costs of treating post-traumatic stress disorder and other reactions can be substantial, as organizations sometimes painfully discover.

One increasingly common response has been to offer critical incident debriefing as soon as possible. This crisis intervention is modeled on those used in battlefield and natural disaster settings, and generally takes the form of semi-structured group meetings. Employees get an opportunity to discuss their observations and reactions. They are given factual information about the workplace event, the nature of normal reactions to trauma, and coping strategies. The goal of early intervention is to reduce the incidence of prolonged and extreme reactions.

In 1993, Barnett-Queen and Bergmann²¹ developed a "continuum of care"—trauma prevention training, post-trauma educational or psychological debriefings, and post-trauma counseling—to prepare for and respond to trauma. Educational sessions teach coping skills and facilitate self-referral for further treatment; psychological debriefing sessions help individuals acknowledge the difficult realities that have occurred, share the emotions stirred by the event, and integrate them into their life experience. Post-trauma counseling focuses on the "here and now" of the trauma experience, and permits discussion of the traumatic event and the likely consequences of trauma.

Fitness for Duty Evaluations

Occupational mental health professionals are sometimes asked to determine whether an employee is psychologically fit to work. For example, individuals who show up for work in an impaired state, or who have made direct or indirect threats to harm themselves or others, or who return to work after an extended absence for substance abuse or mental health treatment, may have problems that effect cognitive, psychological, or behavioral functioning. In such situations, individual clinicians or a multidisciplinary team examines the individual's current problems (if any) and whether they will negatively impact job performance.

In addition to a medical record review and clinical interview, psychological testing is often used to assess the nature, severity, and possible implications of any dysfunction. Examiners review detailed information about the employee's specific job tasks and how safety-sensitive each task is. After the evaluation, recommendations are provided to address not only whether the individual can safely work but also how to facilitate a smooth transition back to work. Clinicians usually do not provide employers with diagnostic or other personal information, but instead write work restrictions as needed and sometimes specify methods for accommodating individuals with acute or chronic problems.

The organization is the primary client in fitness for duty evaluations. Consequently, the examiner must consider what is best for the worker and the workplace.

Workers' Compensation and Disability Claims

Both nationally and in NC, insurance compensation claims for stress-related disorders are growing in frequency yet claims for all other disabling work injuries are decreasing. The evaluation of stress-related disorder claims is difficult and complex. Clinicians may be asked to determine whether a psychological injury resulted from a workplace event or physical injury; whether a pre-employment psychological illness or vulnerability existed that was aggravated by a workplace event; or whether the disability has reached its maximum expected level of improvement and the extent to which it continues to limit an employee's ability to work. The system sometimes wants a degree of certainty and numerical ratings that exceed the scientific knowledge of the field.

Disability Accommodations

The Americans with Disabilities Act requires employers to accommodate individuals who suffer from disabilities including chronic mental illnesses, learning disabilities, and mental retardation. An assessment of disabled individuals' ability to work therefore becomes important. Clearly, some individuals are not capable of functioning in certain work settings, and that determination must be made through appropriate assessment. However, a much larger group of impaired individuals has the potential to make meaningful contributions if job requirements can be modified. The occupational mental health professional can help management and sometimes fellow workers understand the capabilities and special needs of disabled individuals. The professional can also recommend adjustments to enhance work functioning. Success at work benefits not only the employer. By contributing to a positive self-image, it can provide substantial psychological benefits to disabled individuals and even potentiate or enhance the recovery process.

Do Occupational Mental Health Programs Get Results?

The most widely cited study of EAP effectiveness was conducted by Alexander and Alexander for the McDonnell Douglas Corp. Using 1985-1988 data, they compared employees who had used the EAP to obtain mental health or substance abuse treatment and those who had not. Rates of absenteeism and employee and family health care costs were dramatically less for EAP users. So much less, in fact, that the company estimated a savings to investment ratio of approximately 4:1.²²

Other studies have assessed less quantifiable outcomes, including successful resolution of the presenting problem, enhanced well-being, increased job performance, and improvements in overall morale. Levitt claims that some of these studies (including the McDonnell Douglas study) have methodological problems, but substantial benefits to employer and employee have been reported in all. In addition, researchers have found that EAPs decrease the number of accidents and disciplinary actions taken. ²²

Our new world of reformed health care will need additional outcome research on occupational mental health programs. At the same time, outcome research is complicated by rapidly changing workplace and health care delivery systems. Employers, insurers, health care providers, and legislators struggle to shape and adjust to change. And research in occupational mental health will become ever more challenging and important. \Box

Traditional Legal Principles Underlie Occupational and Environmental Medicine Liability

David Warren, JD

A bewildering array of state and federal statutes, agency regulations, company personnel policies, employment contract provisions, and other lawyer-produced "burdens" are imposed on the practice of occupational and environmental medicine. Nevertheless, there is a simple and straightforward method for predicting or preventing occupational and environmental medicine liability: understand the traditional principles of torts and contract law. These legal concepts provide a familiar and intuitive basis for anticipating the possibility of lawsuits, enforcing regulations, and predicting the outcome of court decisions. Although physicians have generally not viewed law as a positive societal force, it is rewardingly instructive to review the juridical principles of liability; they are, once understood, highly logical and useful.³

Most of the new, highly publicized declarations of the rights of employees (and patients) do not represent new regulation of medicine and the workplace. They may sometimes seem intrusive, but the basic framework for determining the legal liability of a physician (acting as either an employee or independent contractor) has been well tested. Of course unusual factual situations or unexpected interpretations of statutes and regulations may seem to defy ordinary precedent and informed predictability, but there really is an overall legal philosophy influencing court and agency decisions on liability in the workplace. Most final adjudications are based on and reflect well-developed, basic principles of the common law regarding physician and employer liability.

A Glossary of Common Law

Common law is the body of judicial rulings. It is based on current and past constitutional doctrines, statutory interpretations, and the customs and practices of professionals and industry. I present here a brief review of basic common law concepts because they demonstrate a pattern that provides both an understanding of and reassurance about the criteria for professional accountability.

Tort: A legal wrong committed upon the person or property of another for which the law gives a civil remedy—usually money damages—for the injury. Negligence, assault, battery, false imprisonment, libel, slander, and invasion of privacy represent torts.

Negligence: The failure to do something that would be done by a reasonable person guided by the considerations that ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, or the commission of some act that would not be done by a prudent and reasonable person. Negligence is not a fixed standard but must be determined in each case by reference to the situation and knowledge of the parties and attendant circumstances.

Example: a company's Employee Assistance Program bungles a voluntary substance abuse assessment and this causes an employee to lose her job.

Malpractice: Negligence that occurs when professionals, while treating or caring for patients or clients, do not conduct themselves with due care or reasonable skill.

Examples: an employee's injury is aggravated by improper manipulation or treatment (such as returning a worker to the job prematurely); an employee's injury (such as chemical exposure) or symptoms (such as appendicitis) are not diagnosed in an accurate and timely manner leading to delay in or absence of appropriate treatment.

Defamation: Any written (libel) or spoken (slander) falsehood that is calculated to injure the reputation of another.

Examples: a false positive HIV status is disclosed (as true positive); a disabled employee is reported as a malingerer.

Mr. Warren is a Professor with the Div. of Occupational and Environmental Medicine, Box 2914, Duke Univ. Medical Center, Durham 27710, and is Executive Director, NC Governor's Institute on Alcohol and Substance Abuse, Inc., Research Triangle Park.

Invasion of privacy: An encroachment on the right not to be subjected to unwarranted or undesired intrusion.

Example: the personal history or medical information about a patient is disclosed without authorization.

Fraud: A generic term embracing the use of false suggestions or the suppression of truth by which one individual gains an advantage over another.

Example: employee medical records are falsified to conceal an embarrassing pattern of minor injuries due to unnecessary biohazard exposure.

Battery: Any physical violence or restraint, even the non-violent touching of a person without consent or authorization. Battery is both a criminal and civil offense.

Examples: an employee is physically restrained for disciplinary purposes; blood tests are performed without oral or written permission (but remember that for most routine medical procedures, consent is implied by the circumstances).

Assault: The threat, real or perceived, of battery. Example: many forms of sexual harassment.

Embezzlement: The fraudulent appropriation to one's own use or benefit of property or money entrusted to one by another.

Example: employees' payments to health insurance fund are not properly deposited.

Breach of contract: The failure, without legal excuse, to fulfill a contract. A contract is a promissory agreement (oral or written) between two or more persons that creates, modifies, or destroys a legal relationship. More simply put, it is an agreement, made upon sufficient "consideration" (usually the transfer of money or services), to do or not to do a particular thing.

Example: refusal to provide appropriate services to an HMO enrollee or covered employee.

Breach of implied warranties: failure of a seller or supplier of products to ensure fitness for a particular use. Proof of fault is not required.

Example: medications are warranted to be safe and effective for designated conditions by the manufacturer, but the knowing administration of a defective drug by a company physician permits the affected patient to sue the doctor.

The Law in Legislation and Regulation

To extend the notion of legal logic and predictability, we must look beyond basic common law principles and examine relevant legislation and regulatory programs. I summarize here some familiar statutes that affect occupational and environmental medicine. Most are a codification or extension of existing common law principles.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended in 1972 and 1992, prohibits unequal workplace treatment based on race, color, religion, sex, national origin, or pregnancy. It applies to hiring, dismissal, promotion, discipline, terms and conditions of employment, and job advertising. The 1992 amendment provides for punitive damages and jury trials.

The Rehabilitation Act of 1973 prohibits discrimination on the basis of handicap. Section 503 prohibits discrimination by government contractors, and Section 504 prohibits discrimination by entities that receive federal financial assistance (including Medicare or Medicaid payments). Institutions can be penalized if they discriminate against qualified but handicapped persons who, with reasonable accommodation, could perform the job in question. Pre-employment inquiries about handicaps are prohibited although applicants can be asked if they would be able to perform the job.

The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) of 1990, an expansion of Rehabilitation Act of 1973 affects a broad range of employment-related health care activities including medical data collection from applicants and employees, drug screening, decisions arising from health and safety concerns, accommodation review, and confidentiality of medical records. The ADA expands the rights afforded disabled persons under the Rehabilitation Act by codifying what courts had established in interpretive rulings about an employer's duty to provide reasonable accommodation.

Sexual harassment statutes, agency regulations, or company policies specify two forms of sexual harassment: 1) quid pro quo sexual harassment wherein job conditions are changed because the employee refuses to submit to sexual demands, and 2) hostile environment sexual harassment wherein an employer's conduct unreasonably interferes with performance or creates an intimidating or offensive environment. The acts of supervisors are generally considered to be carried out on behalf of or with the knowledge of the employer.

The Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA) is the basic workplace safety and health law. It specifies environmental conditions through a combination of industry standards, worksite inspections, labeling and reporting requirements, and criminal and civil enforcement tools. OSHA is sometimes charged with failure to detect flagrant toxic problems in its inspections or even to make inspections at all, but at other times it has been criticized for meddling in the business activities of private companies. Nevertheless, the agency has developed a wide range of standards that affect the safety of employees, and the exposure to toxic materials and harmful physical agents (including hazardous wastes and indoor air pollutants).

Workers' compensation laws hold, in essence, that industrial employers should assume the costs of occupational disabilities regardless of any fault. The resulting economic losses are considered costs of production and are chargeable as a price factor. The laws relieve employers of liability from common law claims involving negligence.⁵ Every state has a workers' compensation system that entitles employees injured to no-fault compensation for accidents arising out of and during the course of employment. Many special rules and administrative precedents have been added since the first workers' compensation law was enacted by Wisconsin in 1911, but the basis for determining most liability is still derived from traditional rules about causation. Recent court interpretations have created exceptions to the original concept that workers' compensation was the exclusive remedy for an injured worker, so that workers can sometimes sue under existing negligence laws. Workers have statutory confidentiality rights and clearly defined procedural rights.

Whistle blower, non-retaliation statutes. New federal and state statutes (such as NC General Statutes section 95-241) prohibit discriminatory or retaliatory action against employees who, in good faith, report or threaten to report health or safety violations of the company, or who exercise their statutory rights and benefits, such as filing a workers' compensation claim.

Conclusion

A clear logic and reasonableness generally runs through the statutory and common law underlying the field of occupational medicine: no liability without fault. However, the increasing frequency of litigation and legislation diminishes the comfort a physician may get from a better understanding of these legal principles.

Furthermore, new statutory rights tend to get publicized and when rights are publicized, citizens become aware of opportunities for judicial vindication and monetary compensation for real or perceived harms. Statutes tend to be more widely disseminated than common law principles. This is true even when the statutes promulgate no new rights, but merely codify common law rights.

Yet even with the proactive role of today's health and safety legislation, many occupational medicine physicians prefer statutory programs, which can be spelled out in pamphlets and handbooks,6 to the less visible common law principles best known to lawyers.4

Essays from the Heart

J. Willis Hurst. New York: Raven Press, 1995, 187 pages, ISBN 0-7817-0239-9, $68

Reviewed by John Campbell, MD, Internal Medicine Training Program, Moses H. Cone Memorial Hospital, 1200 N. Elm St., Greensboro 27401-1020

Although Dr. Hurst describes his essays as being "from the heart" rather than "about the heart," this is not a book of poetry. Most of the essays expound his principles of medical teaching, particularly the problem-oriented medical record system pioneered by Lawrence Weed.

The book is a collection of short essays, many published in other books by Dr. Hurst as journal articles or given as speeches. The essays deal with similar topics and this redundancy lessens the book's impact. There are too many pieces on how to write well. Dr. Hurst's thoughts on medical abbreviations, jargon, and copyright law are accurate but tedious.

His writing style is serious and precise, and his love of teaching and patient care is evident throughout the book. He is at his best when he describes how he learns and teaches. The essay titled "Progress Notes" shows the value of organization, logic, and curiosity, and emphasizes that these traits must emanate from a desire to provide the very best for our patients. Dr. Hurst truly believes that the medical record should be at the center of the learning process. Given the sorry state of medical records in most hospitals, we should all take heed. His comments on why he attends Grand Rounds are obvious but all too often overlooked. His advice should be tattooed on all medical students as a credo of life-long learning.

The essays describing specific patient encounters are wonderful; I only wish there were more of them. Dr. Hurst's efforts to save a woman dying of post-operative renal failure are almost inconceivable. Imagine trying to convince today's hospital administrators and third-party payors that putting a critically ill patient on a commercial flight from Atlanta to Boston is a good idea! His recollections from his time as Lyndon Johnson's cardiologist offer insight into our country's history and provide us some measure of Dr. Hurst's stature as a clinician.

There aren't many must-buy books in medicine anymore. However, anyone interested in teaching should find enough advice and human interest in this book to justify its price.

Hidden Illness in the White House

Kenneth R. Crispell, Carlos F. Gomez. Durham: Duke Univ. Press, 1988, 248 pages, ISBN 0-8223-0839-8, $31.95

Reviewed by Edward C. Halperin, MD, Deputy Editor, Department of Radiation Oncology, Box 3085, DUMC, Durham 27710

I suppose we all know what road is paved with good intentions. I received Hidden Illness in the White House as a present a few years ago and it'd been sitting, faithfully, on my bookshelf ever since waiting for me to open it. I finally read it and am glad I took the time to blow the dust off it.

There is no shortage of books along the lines of Crispell and Gomez's text: studies of the impact of health and illness on national and world leaders. The authors are interested in the influence that a President's health may have on his decision making. They also consider the possible distortion of the physician-patient relationship wherein the President's physician, enamored by the glamour and power of the office, may not make decisions that are in his/her patient's and/or the country's best interest.

The majority of the book consists of detailed case studies of the health status of Woodrow Wilson, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and John Kennedy. Wilson suffered from a series of cerebrovascular accidents cumulating in a dramatic one that afflicted him during a whistle-stop tour in support of Senate ratification of the League of Nations. Most school children learn the story of the "shadow" Presidency when Wilson was confined to bed in the White House and only his wife and physician shuttled in and out of the room. Was Mrs. Wilson actually running the country?

Roosevelt suffered from marked hypertension and died, presumably, from an intracerebral hemorrhage. Historians, politicians, and ideologues have debated whether or not Roosevelt's decision-making powers were impaired during the Yalta Conference and have alleged that the United States "gave away" Eastern Europe to Stalin—perhaps as a result of Roosevelt's vacillation and weakness.

Revisionist historians have only recently taken on Kennedy and the Camelot mythology. Kennedy lied about his educational background, covered up some serious personal and marital problems, and carefully deceived the American public about his Addison's disease. What I had not realized is that Kennedy's Addison's disease was documented in the AMA Archives of Surgery (1955;71:737-42) well before the Presidential campaign of 1960. What a different world we live in! Now the press documents every real or imagined foible of a Presidential candidate. Only 40 years ago an Addisonian US Senator and rumored Presidential candidate was able to undergo life-threatening surgery at a New York hospital, under steroid coverage, without any serious discussion of it during the subsequent Presidential campaign.

In the latter part of the book, Crispell and Gomez dissect the 25th Amendment of the US Constitution. This Amendment is designed to provide for an orderly transition of power as a result of the President or Vice President's death or disability. This is a rather tedious section of the book, which will be of little interest to physicians. Nonetheless, the lengthy "case histories" of Wilson, Roosevelt, and Kennedy make for a good read and provided me with a diverting few evenings—thus making up for the amount of dust that the book accumulated on my shelf before I cracked it.

Bubby, Me, and Memories

Barbara Pomerantz, New York: Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 1983, ISBN 08074-0253-2, $7.95

Reviewed by Edward C. Halperin, MD, Deputy Editor

My mother-in-law recently died and my wife and I were faced with the daunting task of discussing it with our children. The death of a grandparent, or the death of a pet, are probably the first encounters children have with mortality. I found these three books useful. Blow Me a Kiss, Miss Lilly is aimed at five-to 10-year-olds. It tells the story of a little girl who strikes up a friendship with her elderly neighbor, Miss Lilly. When Miss Lilly dies, the little girl visits her garden and takes over care of her cat. The message, for the child, is that it is okay to be sad and that life goes on.

Bubby, Me, and Memories tells, via photographs and text, the story of the death of a little girl's grandmother (Bubby is Yiddish for grandmother and the book is targeted at a Jewish audience.) This book, appropriate for four- to eight-year-olds, is nicely done with evocative photographs.

Wake County Schools publishes the pamphlet, What About the Children: Dealing with Death. It contains a lot of level-headed advice for parents. Parents are advised to explain, in a straightforward way and absent of jargon or euphemisms, the death of a loved one. Sensible advice is given as to whether or not the children should be offered the chance to attend the funeral, talk with clergy members, or visit the cemetery. In many ways Helms and Blazer tell you what your own judgment already advises—but it's good to see it in writing and have your views verified.

The books give children the message that it's acceptable to be sad, that there is no shame in crying, and that life goes on.

Sure... you're a good physician, but can you write?

Most physicians today need more than knowledge of medicine and good clinical ability to be successful. One of the tools you need is the ability to write well: to be able to put together a report of research that's worth publishing, to write a grant proposal that's fundable, to prepare a paper or exhibit for presentation that's well received.

We don't guarantee that you'll write a best seller or get a million-dollar grant, but we can guarantee that if you join us, you'll learn how to improve your writing, enhance the quality of your presentations, and keep up-to-date with developments in areas like desktop publishing.

We're an organization founded by physicians 50 years ago, and we're over 3000 strong. Among our members are people like you, for whom writing has become an increasingly important part of life. Find out more about us.

What can a map tell you about a computer system?

Plenty — if, like this one, it shows how many medical offices in the Carolinas use a particular practice management system to run more efficiently, effectively, and profitably.

For example, it might show how a 16-year commitment to "Working for Physicians" has resulted in over 800 installations in North and South Carolina.

It might bring home how features like "on-the-fly" refiling, encounterform tracking, and direct transmission to North Carolina Medicare,
Medicaid, and Blue Cross/Blue Shield (with no per-claim charges) are improving physicians' revenue.

It could clarify how critical "one-call" support can be in helping offices stay productive—how telephone support staff, software and hardware engineers, technicians, trainers, and a fleet of service vans can provide support unmatched in the industry.

It might demonstrate how ongoing research and development brought innovations like the first integrated, direct electronic claims transmission in a practice management system.

Or it could validate the concept of regional focus: By selling systems only in the Southeast, a computer company can keep customers up-todate on the latest insurance filing requirements.

It could emphasize the flexibility of multi-user, multi-tasking software that runs on the most popular operating system in the world.

And it could illustrate the value of having a computer vendor with a vision for the future and the expertise to make that vision work for you.

There's Hope For Alzheimer's Patients

To the Editor:

Iam responding to Dr. Knut Schmidt-Nielson's letter to the editor in the April Journal ("Alzheimer's—Good News?" NC Med J 1995;56:135-6). Although the Health Watch article ("Alzheimer's Disease: New Hope in the '90s," NC Med J 1994;55:599-602) may have overstated the case regarding manageability, it would be a mistake to be nihilistic about the disease. There is indeed much good news on the horizon, and families who struggle with loved ones with the disease need all the hope they can get!

The 1995 White House Conference on Aging was held May 2-5 in Washington, DC. This conference had not been held since 1981. Preceding the conference, more than 600 preliminary meetings were held across the country. I attended one in San Diego and was very encouraged by the information that was presented.

The February 27, 1995, issue of People magazine carried an article by Dr. Zaven Khatchaturian, associate director of Neurosciences and Neuropsychology of Aging, National Institute of Aging, National Institutes of Health, in Bethesda. Maryland, Dr. Khatchaturian outlined the current research approach to Alzheimer's, stating that "cure is possible, but delay is most probable." This could mean that if we can delay the onset of Alzheimer's symptoms by five years we could reduce by half the number of people with the disease. This would decrease the overall cost of care from $100 billion to $50 billion. Consequently, the major goal these days is to develop drugs or other interventions that will delay the onset of clinical symptoms by five or more years.

Substantial resources exist to support this research, including:

- Twenty-eight research centers around the world, including the Joseph and Kathleen Bryan Alzheimer's Disease Research Center at Duke University in Durham.
- CERAD (Consortium Established for Registration of Alzheimer's Disease, an international consortium organized to share information regarding the disease), headed by Dr. Albert Heyman at Duke.
- 3) A well-established drug toxicity center for screening potential treatments.
- 4) An appropriate animal model for drug testing.
- 5) A genetic brain bank for Alzheimer's.
- 6) Family support organizations, like the Alzheimer's Disease and Related Disorders Association, which has national, state, and local branches.

Clarifying "Captain-of-the-Ship" To the Editor:

Having reviewed the January 1994, NC Supreme Court decision in Harris v. Miller, I was confused by Dr. De Ville's recent article in the Journal challenging the court's use of the "borrowed servant" doctrine to define the relationship of an operating surgeon with a nurse anesthetist practicing without supervision by an anesthesiologist ("Captain-of-the-Ship" is Dead: Are North Carolina Physicians and Surgeons Still Liable For the Acts of Other Health Professionals?" NC Med J 1995;56:166-9).

The practice of anesthesia is the practice of medicine. Nurse practice acts in North Carolina and other states define the circumstances under which nurses may function without direct physician supervision. Nurses do not provide medical services (in this case anesthesia) without physician supervision. The surgeon in this case was certainly aware that no other medical doctor was available to supervise the anesthesia given to this patient. Moreover, the surgeon had previously agreed to comply with the hospital's anesthesia manual, which, acknowledging limitations to the scope of nurse practice, required physician supervision of nurse anesthetists.

Dr. De Ville is undoubtedly correct when he asserts that "captain-of-the-ship" is dead. Nevertheless, I see no reason for concern about a decision affirming the responsibilities of physicians to comply with the rules and regulations of the hospitals in which they practice, and requiring physicians to confirm that the medical care for which they have responsibility meets acceptable standards.

Reference

1 Harris v. Miller, 438 S.E.2d 731 (NC 1994).

Dr. De Ville responds:

I appreciate Dr. Butterworth's comments regarding my discussion of the recent Harris v. Miller decision. I agree with him that physicians should continue to be held responsible for negligent monitoring of affiliated health professionals in specified cases. As I stated explicitly in my concluding remarks, "Physicians who fail to appropriately supervise health professionals under their direction, or who fail to intervene when they observe negligent behavior, can and should be held liable under negligence and negligent supervision doctrines."

However, I did suggest that the socalled "borrowed servant" doctrine as applied in medical environments is conceptually flawed and may pose an unjustifiable threat to physicians and surgeons. Negligent supervision actions rightfully penalize physicians for inadequate monitoring. In contrast, the borrowed servant doctrine may impute financial liability to lead physicians even if the affiliated health professional was adequately supervised. It is this latter, distinct and independent theory that is the focus of my criticism.

Dr. Butterworth's confusion on this subtle point is understandable. A recent North Carolina case that draws on Harris may clarify this issue. In Rouse v. Pitt County Memorial Hospital, Inc., et al,1 the Court of Appeals held that attending physicians have a duty to exercise reasonable care in the supervision of resident physicians and that juries should decide when that duty has been breached. The Rouse court also found, applying the Harris standard, that a jury can hold attending physicians financially liable for the actions of residents if the attendings "had the right to control the manner of the residents' performance of their duties." Consequently, it is theoretically possible for a jury to determine that an attending physician was non-negligent in the treatment of a patient, breached no duty in the supervision of a resident, but is still liable for damage inflicted by the resident under the borrowed servant doctrine.

My article calls for the reexamination of treating physicians and surgeons as the temporary employers of affiliated health professionals under the vicarious liability doctrine of borrowed servant. I made no claim as to the specific facts in the Harris case, nor did I suggest alternatives to the borrowed servant doctrine.

Advance Directives: Simplify the Statutes, Simplify the Forms

To the Editor:

In case you haven't been watching, the number of people who have completed an advance directive document is sorely lagging.

Twenty years ago the NC General Assembly authorized "living wills." Some of us recall the opposition to that legislation—the claims of legalized euthanasia, the charges of pending conspiracies between hospitals, nursing homes, and physicians to let people die. Despite the clamor, the General Assembly assumed that the public was ready for this proposal. It passed successfully, but the public has been so slow to use advance directives that eventually federal legislation was passed to give a gentle nudge. In the past few years, the legislature has broadened the definition of "vegetative state" as used in living wills; more importantly it has legislated the use of a durable power of attorney for health care. Still, the public has not begun to use living wills as anticipated.

Unfortunately, the laws governing advance directives were written under the influence of the NC Bar and are unnecessarily complicated. I have the feeling that most physicians don't know that the Bar intended to make these documents user-unfriendly and lawyer-directed. Anyone who is familiar with NC's advance directives will see the hand of the legal profession in the charge for preparing wills, etc. I don't believe physicians ever thought that patients should need to see a lawyer to complete an advance directive. These documents needn't be complicated or intimidating—especially for the elderly. You can see for yourself by ordering copies of simplified documents from The Hemlock Society, Concern for the Dying, or other groups. These organizations have been doing this for years—even before the NC legislature acted—and their forms are user-friendly and simple, and written to meet each states' statutes.

Why are our forms not simple? Because the governing statutes were written to create complexities rather than minimize them. Other states or groups provide less intimidating forms. Can we improve ours and make the documents more acceptable to the public? Yes! We must use our liaison with the Bar to let them know that we want simplified statutes and simple forms. If need be, we can ask the expert bill-drafting lawyers of the legislature to knock them out in short order—at no expense and without bias.

Physicians who have engaged in public group discussions on advance directives find that their encouragement is needed before any of those in the group will complete a directive. The physician's enthusiasm and willingness to help in the process of completion by explaining the meaning of the questions is the best inducement. If a notary is also present, the process is further expedited.

The medical profession understands why the public should use these health care forms. We need to ensure that the employees of hospitals, nursing homes, or physicians' offices understand as well—these individuals may need guidance in how to be considerate and encouraging because this will motivate patients to complete a living will or durable power of attorney. Those helping personnel also need hands-on experience with the forms. The quicker impediments are removed, the better things will be for patients, their families, physicians, hospitals, nursing homes—everyone!

Fear and Trembling in North Carolina

The Barriers to Primary Medical and Dental Care for AIDS Patients

J. Dale Simmons, MD, and Carolyn Harley, MPA

The significant growth during the past decade in the number of patients with acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) in North Carolina has created a new and mounting need for primary medical and dental care. In Mecklenburg, Durham, and Guilford counties, AIDS is now the leading killer of people age 20 to 39. The number of cases statewide grew from two in 1983 to more than 4,700 by May 1994. The rate of increase in cases and the severity of the disease affects not only the patients, but also the state's public health.

Despite the growing need, public health officials report that people with AIDS often have difficulty finding primary medical and dental care. Both patients and care providers know the barriers to care, especially AIDS patients' desire for anonymity and physicians' and dentists' fear that they will lose other patients if they treat those with AIDS. These barriers (and others) must be understood if doctors are to fulfill their responsibility to the people of North Carolina. The unavailability of primary care means that the medical community must devise ways to provide care for these patients.

Barriers to Care

Complex forces impede the delivery of appropriate primary medical and dental care to AIDS patients. Ten obstacles were identified at a 1994 meeting called by State Health Director Dr. Ronald Levine to address community-based primary medical and dental care for NC AIDS patients (Table 1, at right).³

The fear associated with trying to find medical and dental care was identified by patients and their families as a major barrier to care, particularly the fear of losing anonymity by sceking treatment locally. Other barriers included the poverty of most HIV-infected patients, and the prevalence of social and personality characteristics that make it difficult for infected patients to seek care and to comply with physicians' instructions. Worries about finding care for children or other household members who are HIV positive also interfere with patients' efforts to obtain care for themselves.

The concerns—real or fantasied—of physicians and other health care providers may discourage them from taking AIDS patients into their practices and sabotage their efforts to provide care. Physicians give many reasons for not accepting HIV-positive patients: the fear of losing other patients, the fear that they are inadequately trained to manage the complex medical problems of AIDS patients (this is one of the chief reasons primary care physicians refer AIDS patients to specialists⁴), and fear that they will be isolated from a supportive network of peers and consultants. Doubts that AIDS patients (or their insurers) will be able to pay for care only complicate the picture. The burden of caring for AIDS patients sometimes seems overwhelming to primary medical and dental care providers.

Primary care physicians who accept HIV-positive patients become discouraged if they do not receive complete follow-up and consultation reports from tertiary care center consultants. Intentionally or not, some consultants correspond with referring primary care physicians only when patients are near death.

Medical office staff also pose a barrier to care if they or their families are irrationally fearful of HIV transmission. They sometimes refuse to care for HIV-positive patients in order to preserve their home lives. Because the risk of HIV transmission to health care workers is so low, physicians and dentists must lead efforts to educate other health care providers and their staff about the virtually negligible risk if universal precautions are followed. Physicians and dentists must recognize and be sensitive to some of the biases or prejudices they themselves hold that may impede their ability to provide care to HIV-infected patients. In this context, physicians and dentists should lead in the education of other providers and of society in general about HIV, AIDS, and their impact on health care. We are most effective as educators when we ourselves set the example.

Dr. Simmons is Director, Division of Adult Health Promotion, and Ms. Harley is Head, AIDS Care Branch, Division of Adult Health Promotion, NC Department of Environment, Health and Natural Resources, P.O. Box 27687, Raleigh 27611-7687.

Both physicians and AIDS patients tend to create their own barriers when they use tertiary care centers for primary care. This preference is based on a "myth," according to the North Carolina AIDS Task Force Report of 1988. In arguing against creation of a centralized AIDS care treatment center in the state, the authors of this prescient report said that it

*Adapted from "Barriers to Accessing Primary Care for Persons Living with HIV Disease," presented by Carolyn Harley, Division of Adult Health Promotion, AIDS Care Branch, at a conference on "Community-Based Primary Medical and Dental Care for Persons with HIV/AIDS" April 5, 1994.

"would further compromise future provision of care by maintaining the myth that [people with AIDS] can be cared for only by highly trained 'AIDS specialists." In fact, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention emphasize the role of primary care physicians in caring for AIDS patients. "Treatment of HIV infection and disease requires...the skills of the primary care physician," according to Merle A. Sande, MD, chief of medical services at San Francisco General Hospital and an HIV expert used by the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases. Dr. Sande adds that "the finest expression of medicine lies in the optimal blend of [the] science and the art of patient care."

The preference for tertiary care centers obscures the ability of primary care to address the needs of patients with AIDS. The National Commission on Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome reported that primary care providers should be able to counsel about risks of HIV transmission, diagnose and treat early HIV disease, monitor patient care, and recognize complications that require consultation or referral to specialists.⁶

Primary care is lacking in both urban and rural North Carolina. In some areas, physicians and dentists serve such small caseloads that they know of few colleagues to tap as resources for consultation and referral. In other areas, physicians can draw on a set of consultants with experience in caring for HIV-positive patients. Remote or lightly populated communities may be nearly devoid of available primary care providers, but fortunately physician assistants and nurse practitioners are valuable assets to our health care delivery system. With proper training and supervision, these providers can improve the delivery of health care to NC's HIV-positive population, particularly in rural areas.

Even in communities where primary care is readily available, the lack of community resources may prove a significant barrier. For example, the absence of public transportation in rural areas may tax the scarce financial resources of most AIDS patients.³ Often public and private service agencies have neither the financial nor human resources to provide the support services AIDS patients need.

Overcoming Barriers to Care

Cooperation among physicians, other health care providers, public health, and community agencies must occur if we are to overcome the barriers to primary medical and dental care.

Several approaches to such a cooperative effort were proposed at an April 5, 1994, meeting in Raleigh to discuss community-based primary medical and dental care for AIDS patients.⁷ The active participation and leadership of community-based health care providers was deemed essential, as was that of the public health sector, to overcoming barriers to care. Such leadership could promote the development and use of special clinic sites and appointment times by local health departments, support increased Medicaid reimbursement for primary care of HIV-positive patients, and encourage more training and education for medical office staff and their families. Fostering better communication between primary and tertiary care physicians was cited as another avenue for public health leadership efforts.

Not only public health agencies, but all members of the public service sector need to cooperate to reduce care barriers. Transportation is a frequent barrier; the NC Department of Transportation and local transportation officials could contribute to solving this problem. Representatives of transportation, public health, and community organizations will meet to discuss this topic. Furthermore, the AIDS Care Branch in the DEHNR Division of Adult Health Promotion, helps coordinate health care delivery to HIV-positive people throughout the state, as does the NC Medical Society, through its Sexually Transmitted Disease and AIDS Committee.

In discussions to date, though, community physicians and health care providers have stressed the need for change to come from within their local peer networks. Attention to the need for privacy and trust can help overcome patient non-compliance, one of the barriers to care of HIV-positive patients.³ Good primary care requires the provision of emotional support, whether developed at primary care offices or at other sources such as the counseling services of tertiary care centers. Physicians can help find ways to increase Medicaid eligibility and to ensure that all potential options for health insurance coverage and eligibility are understood and explored. One physician noted, for example, that HIV-positive patients who have AIDS-related dementia or psychiatric disorders may qualify more readily for Medicaid.⁷

We need better and more frequent communication between primary and tertiary care physicians. Primary care physicians and dentists can provide for most of the health care needs of HIV-positive patients until late stages of the disease, but they need back-up from infectious disease consultants. Physicians emphasize that their personal and professional relationships, and the ability to communicate within those relationships, are essential to their care of HIV-positive and other patients.⁷

Call to Action

Primary medical and dental health care providers must overcome the existing barriers if they want to provide the care that they pledged themselves to when they became professionals. It is imperative that all health care and human services providers, agencies, and institutions share in the care of people with AIDS. If primary care physicians, dentists, and other care providers do not help care for these patients, then the mental and physical health—the very careers—of those who do provide such care are jeopardized. One of the more forceful recommendations of the NC AIDS Task Force was that the licensing boards for the health care professions should regard refusals to provide appropriate care to people with AIDS as unethical and invoke disciplinary measures where appropriate.

We recognize that many of the barriers addressed in this article may appear intractable, yet a number of practical steps can be taken immediately that will chip away at the foundation that allows these barriers to exist. Physicians and dentists can start by taking advantage of a wealth of educational opportunities to increase their confidence in treating this disease. The NC AIDS Training Network offers courses to health care professionals, including medical office staff in some instances. Miniresidencies are available through the four medical schools in our state, as well as at Carolinas Medical Center in Charlotte and Moses H. Cone Memorial Hospital in Greensboro, Clinical Practice Guidelines, published by the federal government, offers practical suggestions and solutions for physicians. For a free copy call 1-800/342-AIDS. The AIDS Care Branch of the Division of Adult Health Promotion provides an extensive listing of these and other resources; call 919/715-3160 for details.

Many, probably most, health care providers entered their professions in order to to relieve the pain and suffering of all their fellow human beings. We need to encourage physicians and dentists to realize the urgent need for their care. Some suggestions have been voiced already; others must be articulated by the health care providers of NC so that they can evaluate and adopt them for use. We have a precedent to uphold: When the chips are down, doctors come through. \square

Bridging the Culture Gap

Caring for Patients with Sexually Transmitted Diseases

Jennifer Schuster, MPH, James C. Thomas, MPH, PhD, and Eugenia Eng, DrPH

A majority of reported cases of gonorrhea and syphilis occur among low-income blacks.¹² In sexually transmitted disease (STD) clinics maintained by public health departments—the primary source of STD care for low-income populations—curable STDs are treated and behaviors such as condom use to reduce the risk of future infections are encouraged.^{3,4}

All professional service providers who interact with the clients of STD clinics (disease intervention specialists, law enforcement personnel, social workers, and educators) have an opportunity to encourage preventive behaviors. Since culture plays a prominent role in determining behavior, when cultural differences exist between service providers and their clients, the burden is on the providers to understand the social environment and culture of their clientele—otherwise, the very services they provide are liable to be ineffective. However, STD clients commonly perceive their care as unsympathetic and coercive rather than culturally sensitive.⁵

As part of a study of a rural North Carolina county with high rates of STDs, we examined perspectives of service providers and STD clinic attendees regarding the behaviors and culture of attendees. The study is called the Sexually Transmitted Epidemic Prevention (STEP) Project, and we refer to the county as STEP County. The principal component of the STEP Project is an epidemiologic study of psychosocial factors associated with repeat STD infections among clients of the public health clinic. Data for the survey were gathered using a standardized, confidential questionnaire administered by an interviewer to STD clinic clients. This sort of standardized technique facilitates quantification and is the mainstay of epidemiology, but it is inadequate or inappropriate for gathering some types of data. In order to identify factors in the client's lives that contribute to STD transmission, we used anonymous, qualitative interviews to elicit the perspectives of STD clinic elients and the professional service providers who interact with them. This qualitative method allowed each respondent to express ideas and world views in his or her own language. Systematic analysis of interview data enabled us to summarize "insider" perspectives of clients and providers.

Methods

STEP County, NC, with a population of 67,000, was selected because the excellence of its health department provided the potential for good research collaboration and because the county has one of the state's highest rates of STDs. In 1991, the gender-, age-, and race-adjusted rates of syphilis and gonorrhea were 4.8 and 1.6 times the overall state rates, respectively (Thomas JC, unpublished data). Within the county, 80% of syphilis cases and 68.5% of gonorrhea cases were treated at the health department's STD clinic located in the central town.⁴ An average of 12 people visit the clinic daily. It is open approximately six hours per day Monday through Friday, and STD treatment is available free of charge. Usually there are three clinical staff in the STD clinic at any one time. All are women and none is a physician.

Selection of participants for qualitative research was not done for purposes such as statistical power. Rather, the number and types of people were chosen to provide a range of perspectives among providers and clients, and to identify recurrent themes by having multiple people in each group describe the phenomena of interest. Twenty clients with a suspected STD were interviewed: 10 were men and 10 women; 18 were black (these proportions approximate the gender and racial distribution of the clientele served by the STD clinic). The interviews were conducted anonymously in a private room at the health department immediately following the client's clinical examination. Those completing the interview were paid $20.

We also interviewed 24 STEP County health and human service providers who were likely to come into contact with people at risk for STDs. There were 10 nurses and two health educators from the county health department, four health care providers from other agencies, three staff members from the law enforcement and penal systems, two mental health care providers, two educators, and one social service provider. Together they represented the full range of agencies providing services to the population of interest.

Client interviews were semi-structured and lasted up to two hours. An interviewer-guide specified the topics to be discussed, but the sequence and wording of questions depended on the points raised by the respondent. Clients were asked about relationships with partners, condom use, sources of knowledge and beliefs about STD transmission, the exchange of sex for drugs or for material support, access to care, and treatment for STDs. Provider interviews lasted about one hour; providers were asked to consider the same issues and how they pertained to people believed to be at high risk for STDs.

All client interviews were recorded (with permission) and transcribed for analysis with Ethnograph software. Whenever a respondent addressed a particular issue, (for example, condom use) the statements were labeled. Random sections of the transcripts were independently labeled a second time by another person to check the reliability of the labeling process. Statements with the same label were extracted from all interviews, listed together in a single file, and read for recurring themes. A similar process, based on responses written by the interviewers, was used for the provider interviews. We analyzed provider and client texts separately before making comparisons between the two groups. In this report we focus mainly on differences between the perspectives of providers and clients.

Results

Providers and clients were notably different in age, race, and educational attainment (Table 1). The prototypical client was a 26-year-old, black person with a high school education or less, although the prototypical provider was a 37-year-old, white individual who was educated beyond high school. Providers and clients confirmed that contact between the two groups was limited largely to professional interactions even though 80% of both groups had lived in STEP County for more than five years.

All of the providers were, by definition, employed, but 30% of the clients (four women and two men) were unemployed. The occupations reported by the six employed female clients included nurse's aide, stitcher in a clothing factory, forklift driver, and production worker; the eight employed male clients held positions such as convenience store clerk, construction worker, welder, and tobacco tester.

Six (60%) of the female and four (40%) of the male clients had children. Most of the women, but none of the men, lived alone with their children. About one-third of the clients lived with their parents; many had previously lived alone or with partners, but for financial reasons returned to their parents' home.

Partners, relationships, and condom use. Most of the clients reported having more than one sexual partner and described differing levels of commitment, responsibility, and trust with various partners. Both men and women differentiated between steady partners and others with whom they had sex. One female client said "A 'boyfriend' is when you have a relationship, you go out, you talk. I would say a 'male friend' may be someone that I have sex with and that's it." Though multiple partnerships were common, both men and women reported feelings of betrayal when they discovered that their steady partner had other sexual relationships.

Both male and female clients said that decisions about condom use were tied to the level of trust and commitment they placed in a given partner. One woman said: "But the guys that I call myself dating just on a one-relationship basis, I don't use condoms. 'Cause I feel like if he tells me he ain't gonna screw nobody and I tell him I'm not going to screw nobody else then that's the way it should be." Several men and women with a steady partner but still dating others used condoms with 'outside' partners. A male client said: "Okay, I'll put it like this, when I'm out playing around, not with [my steady partner but with] other girls, if I decide to, in the street, yeah [I'll use a condom]. Home, no. 'Cause I ain't gonna take nothing home."

Other factors relating to condom use mentioned by clients included past experience with a partner, information from friends, marital status, and observation of the partner's presentation, underwear, and genitals. Reasons for not using condoms included: negative past experiences with condoms, the perceived stigma of condom use, unavailability of a condom when needed, and reduced pleasure. Several clients reported that condoms had broken during use. One man reported using petroleum jelly as a lubricant, a practice that chemically harms the condom, and another spoke of difficulty properly applying condoms.

Providers' descriptions of the social and sexual behaviors of clients matched the clients' descriptions, but didn't include the contexts of complex relationships, social norms, and motivations described by the clients. The providers all felt that clients had multiple sexual partners, but they provided little detail about the nature of relationships between partners. One provider said, "They have many women, usually two to 10 partners in a 30-day recall." Another commented, "Teens have multiple partners and their partners have lots of partners."

"Clients named family, friends, and personal experience as the most important sources of information about STDs."

Providers' portrayals focused on clients' failure to use condoms, but none mentioned how clients made decisions about condom use. One provider succinctly voiced the views of several others by saying that "Males won't use condoms." Only one provider gave reasons: "Females don't practice prevention. There's a stigma that [condoms are] not natural. Allergies; decreased sensitivity; expense; and they don't have them when they need them."

Sources of knowledge and beliefs about STD transmission. Clients named family, friends, and personal experience as the most important sources of information about STDs. For example, one female client said, "That was the first time I ever had something and I didn't know [about] the claps or crabs or whatever they call them. And I be asking my sister." Clients were informed about some aspects of STDs, but many were unfamiliar with other important aspects, such as the possibility of transmitting asymptomatic infections or not transmitting a known infection. A female client said, "I can't understand—how did I give it to this guy and didn't give it to my married friend? So I figure this guy gave it to me, because I was with the married guy about a week before I was with [the other] and I would' a gave it to him if I had it. I would' a gave it to my married friend and he would have told me."

In marked contrast, most providers believed that health and human service providers were clients' primary source of STD information. One stated, "They come to nurses for advice about medical information, they don't know the nurses personally so they feel comfortable talking about STDs." The providers felt that clients were aware of the risks associated with unprotected sex but chose not to protect themselves. One provider said, "Yes, they know, but they think, 'What are the odds? She's a clean girl.'" Another said, "They know somewhat, but the knowledge doesn't make them change their behavior. In their minds they know it. But they push it to the back of their minds." None of the providers mentioned the possibility that clients might be confused about transmission of asymptomatic infections or the non-transmission of known infections.

The exchange of sex for drugs or material support. Clients mentioned the exchange of sex for drugs that occurs in the county (none acknowledged personal drug use), but said that exchange of sex for material support of women and their children was more common. One female client said, "[Men] offer me anything—you know, money—or they can buy me this or they can give me money, 'cause I needed money for my light bill and [they say] I'll give you money for your light bill." Two women indicated that they exchanged sex for child support from the estranged fathers of their children.

Providers felt that drug use was pervasive among STD clients. Many providers, particularly law enforcement officers, described the connection between the drug trade, drug use, and STD transmission in STEP County. They explained that alcohol and drug use impair inhibition, that sex is used to obtain drugs, and that drug dealers use money and drugs to attract women. One said, "The guys selling the drugs are high risk because they've got drugs to buy sex with. They move around selling drugs and everywhere they move they are having different sex partners." A few providers observed that sex was used as a commodity to barter for goods other than drugs. One provider commented, "Women use sexuality as a resource to get security, safety, shelter."

Access to care and the consequences of STDs. Both providers and clients mentioned several barriers to health care for STDs: the cost of treatment in private offices, private physicians' discrimination against people with STDs, the stigma of being seen or treated at the health department, and the use of illegally obtained antibiotics to treat infections.

"Because there is no way to prove who gave an infection to whom, partners blame one another. Women reported being blamed for infections more often than men."

The clients described consequences of an STD diagnosis ranging from blame to beating. Because there is no way to prove who gave an infection to whom, partners blame one another. Women reported being blamed for infections more often than men. "Most time now, when somebody get a disease, the boy can't have the disease and be the one gave it to the girl. But [the men], they'll be pushing and cussin' you out, 'female dog.'" About one-fourth of the clients reported that relationships had ended because of an infection. A young man said, "I used to have a girlfriend 'til I had to come out here [to the STD clinic]." Several men, after being diagnosed with an STD, reported assaulting their partners, and women reported being assaulted.

One man said "I beat that girl's butt...then my sister got her. My sister beat her." One woman who had previously been abused by her partner chose not to tell him about the infection. "Today when I get home I'm going to tell him I got a bladder infection. I'm not going to have sex because it's hurting me. And I'll think of something."

In contrast, most providers thought that an STD diagnosis had little effect on their clients' lives. They described clients as being detached and nonchalant about STDs. One said, for example, "They just don't care [that they have an infection]." None mentioned physical violence as a potential consequence of a client's informing a partner of infection.

Discussion

Health service providers were aware of behaviors practiced by clients but had only a limited understanding of the cultural context of the behaviors. They knew, for example, that condoms were infrequently used, but they did not know how varying relationships determine condom use decisions. They were aware that some people are infected frequently, but did not understand the effect of a diagnosis of an STD on client's relationships. These cultural factors play an important role in disease transmission. Fear of losing a valued relationship or of physical harm strongly discourage infected persons from notifying their partners to seek treatment.

The failure of service providers to respond to cultural factors compromises the effectiveness of programs to control and prevent STDs. The culture gap we found is not surprising given the sociodemographic differences between service providers and clients. These two groups come from "different worlds" of income, race, age, and education. The two worlds coexist in separate parts of the county and town, so service providers don't observe clients' relationships or hear the daily conversations that express the values underlying their sexual behaviors. The one place where the two groups do interact—the STD clinic—is dominated by the providers' culture. The professional value of efficiency in clinical interactions denies clients the opportunity to communicate the details of their lives openly and fully. Instead, providers determine the issues that will be addressed during a visit. 9,10

If the gaps we noted are as prevalent elsewhere, the barriers to learning the relevant details of clients' lives and their con-

ISSUE	ressing the disparities PERSPECTIVE		POTENTIAL MEANS FOR PROVIDERS TO ADDRESS CURRENT DISPARITIES
Partners and condom use	Provider The practice of multiple sex partners and unprotected sex is the norm among the population at risk for STDs	Client A person may have multiple sex partners, but condoms are used most often with casual partners since a primary relationship with a steady partner is highly valued and sexual exclusivity is expected.	Counseling that facilitates discussion of the qualities of relationships with various partners and encourages protective behaviors specific to particular relationships.
STD knowledge and sources of information on STDs	The population at risk is knowledgeable about STD transmission, and their primary source of information is public health professionals	Though STD clinic personnel are knowledgeable and helpful, personal experience and family and friends are the primary sources of information on STDs. Asymptomatic infections and non-transmission from a known infection are not well understood.	Train lay health advisors to disseminate accurate information on STDs through natural social networks.
Economic factors in sex	Sex is exchanged predominantly for drugs.	Sex is exchanged predominantly for material support to meet basic needs.	Assure that clients are con- nected with social service agencies and can obtain the services for which they are qualified.
The meaning of an STD infection	Becoming infected with a curable STD is of some concern, but no serious consequence is felt by those infected since treatment is available.	Because of the high value of a relationship with a steady partner and the expectation for sexual exclusivity, painful consequences such as verbal abuse, termination of a relationship, and/or physical violence frequently follow an infection.	Learn strategies for safely informing partners of infection and rehearse with clients how they will inform particular partners.

cerns about STDs are truly formidable. In order to lessen these obstacles, service providers need to create a non-threatening atmosphere in their interactions with clients. Ideally, the racial distribution of service providers would reflect that of the clients, but in rural areas such as STEP County, it is hard to find qualified staff at all, much less those with specific characteristics. It is therefore essential that all providers learn cross-cultural sensitivity and communication. One way to do this is to create opportunities for providers to learn from clients about their culture in a culturally neutral setting.

Improved communication and a better understanding of the cultural context of risky behaviors would give service providers new ways of encouraging preventive behaviors (Table 2, previous page). For example, providers might explore economic alternatives such as job training or eligibility for social services with women who are exchanging sex for money to meet basic needs. Lessening the economic incentives for casual sex would strengthen the prevailing expectation among clients of sexual fidelity by a steady partner, thereby reducing STD transmission.

To increase the chances that sexual contacts will volunteer for an exam and treatment, providers might learn how some clients ensure their safety while informing partners about an infection, and then share that strategy with other clients. When discussing with a client how to avoid reinfection, the provider could find out about the types of partners and rehearse with the client ways to safely inform partners who may be infected. Since clients rely on friends and family for STD information and advice, providers could collaborate with others from the clients' culture. By working with people who have a reputation for good judgment, sound advice, and the ability to maintain confidentiality, an STD prevention program could engage natural channels of communication to disseminate skills and accurate information.

There is a cultural chasm between service providers and those most at risk for STDs in STEP County, but other communities should be studied before generalizing the results. In any case, whenever a culture gap exists, a challenge also exists for service providers and clients to bridge the gap by forming collaborative relationships. What is clear is that familiarity with the knowledge and experiences of culturally defined groups is helpful and can be used to construct innovative and effective programs. \Box

Let's Respect Our Young People and Teach Them The Truth

by Charles Ellenbogen, MD, FACP, Head, Department of Internal Medicine/ Subspecialty Clinics, Fayetteville Area Health Education Center, Fayetteville

Jennifer Schuster, James C. Thomas, and Eugenia Eng detail the cultural gap separating providers of care from patients with STDs in the public health department of one North Carolina county. The gap between the knowledge and attitudes of the patients and of the providers is substantial. The patients lack basic knowledge about their disease and how to prevent transmitting it; the providers lack basic knowledge about the attitudes and behaviors by which the patients place themselves at risk. But the biggest gap concerns the substantial effect of STDs on the life and relationships of the patients and the providers' beliefs that STDs have no such effect. Some providers even think that their patients don't care whether they have an STD.

Perhaps some of the gaps are, indeed, due to cultural differences. It is not hard to believe that a 37-year-old, educated, white, health service professional with high stature in the community will see the world differently from a 26-year-old, black with a high school education and a 30% chance of having no job at all. But cultural disparity can't explain some of the findings. It cannot explain the STD providers' belief that their patients don't even care about having an STD. Cultural disparity cannot explain the STD providers' ignorance of how STDs destroy the patients' relationships or result in violence. Schuster, Thomas, and Eng remind us of an earlier study in which STD patients described their treatment as unsympathetic and coercive. Is it possible that providers lack basic respect for their patients? Are they "burned-out" from trying to help young people with minimal resources, self-destructive behavior, and the hopelessness that comes from low social stature? Does it matter?

The failure of young people to avoid STD transmission has far deeper origins in our society than the beliefs and behavior of the health care providers described in the present study. Since 1987, North Carolina law' has mandated that public schools provide instruction about HIV infection and other STDs. Prevention of infection is the explicit educational goal of this law. Since the patients studied by Schuster and colleagues had all attended at least some high school, any STD prevention instruction they received obviously failed. Schuster, Thomas, and Eng have confirmed the failure of our state's current approach to STD prevention.

Why has legally mandated preventive education failed? Perhaps it too is insensitive to the cultural differences between white and minority youths. Perhaps it too is insensitive to the social immaturity and need of teenagers of any heritage for specific behavioral guidance.2 Perhaps the education system prefers moral posturing to discovering teenagers' real feelings about sexuality and morality, to helping them recognize and devise healthy moral responses to the behavioral challenges they face. Our policymakers seem always to reiterate that abstinence is the sole acceptable teenage sexuality: the "just say no" approach. Well, "just say no" does not succeed, as the data of Schuster, Thomas, and Eng demonstrate. When we adults tell North Carolina teenagers, "Don't do it because I say so," we admit that we believe them to be immoral, insensitive, and incapable of learning. Do we really believe that?

In fact we all know that teenagers and young adults in North Carolina, of all racial and ethnic heritages, are as interested in leading healthy, moral lives as any policymaker or parent. They want to abstain from unhealthy, immoral, self-destructive sexual behavior as much as any adult. We cheat them when we pretend that "just say no" is enough. We cheat them because they want to learn how to live moral, healthy lives, but those desires have little chance against the intense instruction in unhealthy behaviors and attitudes that inundate them daily from television, books, magazines, even bill-boards. We certainly know that teens talk to each other about sex and sexuality. Yet we sometimes pretend that the tender sensitivities of our youngsters cannot handle the moral tension of coeducational learning about the most intensely coeducational experience they will share in their entire life: sex.

Actually, we all know why "just say no" alone cannot work. Healthy sexuality is a complex system of social skills and knowledge. People aren't born knowing what is required for safe and healthy sexual behavior or how to perform it. They have to learn. It is true that parents should do some or most of the teaching, but most of us parents aren't ourselves any better educated or aware of sexuality than our children. What the parents can't teach should be taught in school, as the law requires. Consider the following analogy. Suppose I want my teenage daughter to play the trumpet. Because she loves me and loves music, she also wants to play the trumpet. So is my next step to hand her a trumpet and say, "Just play"? Pretty silly, isn't it? No matter how much my daughter wants to play, I know, and you know, that unless she gets lessons from someone who both knows how to play and how to teach about playing the trumpet, she will fail.

We expect our school systems to teach our children how to safely enjoy many complex systems that are part of adult life. Driver's education is available in high schools across the state. Extensive schoolroom instruction in computers and information management systems gives our children future success in the modern job market. Instruction in healthy nutrition, in athletic skills and sports are required of all students. We respect our children's ability to mature and learn complex knowledge and behavior systems. We speak proudly of how their excellent performance reassures us about their future as leaders of North Carolina.

In stark contrast with our respect for their ability to learn about and perform behind the wheel of a car, beneath a basketball hoop, and at the computer keyboard, we pretend that they cannot make moral healthy choices about sex. If driver's education consisted only of telling all teens to drive safely, we would laugh our legislators out of office. If teens are sexually promiscuous, perhaps the blame is ours because we haven't taught them how to choose the moral, healthy alternatives they prefer. Instead, we abandon them to the behavioral seduction of television and magazines. Politicians talk about "sending the right message." What message do we send when we put learning about sex far below learning about cars, basketballs, and computers? Is our message that we do not expect teen agers to be moral and self-respecting about sex, only about inanimate objects?

Let's promote the truth. Sex is a wonderful and fulfilling part of adult life. Our teenagers are capable of great moral strength and trustworthiness. Our youth deserve direct, age-and culture-relevant guidance in applying these wonderful attributes to adult sexuality. But we must also teach them that sexuality is demanding. It requires discipline, self-respect, and respect for others. If we learn to teach this, and teach it right, and do it now, perhaps our children can avoid the high rate of marital discord, divorce, and single-parent house-holds that mark our generation's lack of success in mature sexual relationships.

Schuster, Thomas, and Eng are to be congratulated for demonstrating the magnitude of our cultural insensitivity to patients with STDs. But we cannot blame STD health service providers for a problem that runs as deep in our society as this one does. We can help our youth lower their risk of STDs by accepting our responsibility to teach the knowledge and skills needed for normal healthy sexuality. Surely we need to give our teenagers as much guidance and support in this vital area of life as we offer for automobiles, computers, and trumpets. \square

Office Rx

James U. Adelman, MD, FACP, and Randal L. Von Seggern, PharmD, BCPS

The drive toward national health reform challenges us to expand the delivery of services while slowing the growth of health care costs. Without doubt, reform will change the delivery of services by health care professionals. Roles, responsibilities, and alliances will change, especially those involving physician extenders. But with change comes opportunity.

Clinical pharmacists with advanced training—clinical pharmacotherapy specialists (CPS)—are an under-recognized physician extender. In this article we describe the successful incorporation of a PharmD (Doctor of Pharmacy)/CPS into patient care management in a physician's office.

The Past

Historically, the professional medical office has been staffed by physicians and nurses. The emergence of physician assistant (PA) and nurse practitioner (NP) programs in the 1960s added these non-physician providers to office staff. The diagnostic, therapeutic, and educational services provided by PA and NP physician extenders contribute to a high level of medical care.

During the first half of the 20th century physicians and pharmacists interacted closely in managing medication therapy because the pharmacist often had to compound the "remedy" prescribed by the doctor for the patient's ailment. As pharmacists moved more into retailing and as the pharmaceutical industry developed and produced pre-packaged medications, the consulting relationship between the physician and pharmacist waned. At present, the physician alone manages a patient's drug therapy; the pharmacist has little or no input apart from filling the written prescriptions, checking for possible interactions of drugs with one another, and educating the patient on dosage, administration techniques, and potential side effects.

As the consulting relationship between physician and pharmacist has diminished, the frequency and toxicity of polypharmacy has dramatically increased. The knowledge of physicians about pharmacology has not increased in step with the complexity of medication regimens. A recent study criticized the brief time medical students devote to the study of pharmacology and claimed that their training was inadequate to ensure proper management of medications for the elderly. In fact, much of the drug information used by physicians comes solely from drug salespeople.

Recognizing that drug therapy regimens are becoming increasingly complex, the University of Michigan developed a Doctor of Pharmacy (PharmD) program in the early 1960s. Similar programs soon followed at other schools. Doctoral-level pharmacists receive advanced training in pathophysiology, clinical pharmacology, research methods, and physical assessment. A minimum of five years of clinical experience (or completion of an accredited pharmacy residency program) and a rigorous board examination precedes certification as a CPS. Because of these programs many PharmDs have the high-level skills and special knowledge to again assist physicians in management of drug therapy, although in new ways.

The Present

Nearly 40 million US citizens have no health care insurance. The American College of Physicians has stated its position in writing: "[Physicians] must address this need in the immediate future. One potential solution is to expand the role of non-physician providers in the health care system." The health care plan President Clinton put forth in 1994 proposed doubling the number of NP and PA trainees because physician extenders have been well accepted by the American medical consumer. In 1993, a nationwide Gallup poll found that 86% of Americans were willing to get everyday health care from an advanced practice nurse. As a result, nurse clinicians and physician assistants are in urgent demand.

Physician extenders deliver care by practicing in conjunction with either a primary care or specialty care physician. At present approximately 95,400 advanced-practice nurses⁵ and 23,350 PAs⁶ are engaged in clinical practice. They successfully gather medical histories, perform physical examinations, order and review laboratory data, and prescribe medications. In fact, internists estimate that 49% of the patients that come to them for a primary care or specialty care visit could be safely cared for by NPs and PAs⁷ (in consultation with the physician when indicated).

To achieve NP status, licensed registered nurses must take advanced training for nine to 24 months. US Public Health Service guidelines for NP education do not require training in pharmacology although most programs do provide about three credit hours of coursework. Physician assistant training lasts two to four years, culminating in a rigorous examination and certification upon successful completion. In PA programs, pharmacology consists of zero to four credit hours of classes, as well as incorporation into "Clinical Medicine" courses taught during the first year.

During their training, NPs and PAs focus on assessment and diagnosis, even though most patients visit the office for medication adjustments and most leave with prescription(s) in hand. Despite the fact that the bulk of patient visits involve adjustment of medication, it is rare that a clinical pharmacist or pharmacologist is a member of the office staff.

Bachelor of Science (BS) pharmacists take eight to 10 credit hours of pharmacology in addition to medicinal chemistry and other drug-related courses. Another 10 to 16 credit hours of combined pharmacology and pathophysiology (including courses in clinical pharmacokinetics and medicinal toxicology) are required for a PharmD degree. Since PharmD training is weighted toward pharmacotherapy rather than physical assessment and diagnosis, practitioners of this discipline could profitably work with the physician to manage certain patients.

PharmDs already have important roles in medical centers and hospitals. They manage therapeutic schedules for theophylline, anticonvulsants, aminoglycosides, heparin, warfarin, antihypertensives, and other medications. They design parenteral nutrition formulas and conduct pharmacology research. But this rejuvenation of the physician-pharmacist consulting relationship has so far been limited almost exclusively to the hospital setting. The outpatient office provides a new opportunity, and it is our efforts in that setting that we now describe.

The CPS in Our Practice

Our office practice is limited to the diagnosis and treatment of headache. When patients come to the office the nurse or the CPS takes a detailed headache and medical history. The physician reviews the information, performs a physical examination, makes the diagnosis, and formulates a treatment plan. If the plan calls for medication, the CPS is consulted to instruct the patient about the pathophysiology of the disease process and its relationship to treatment. Therapeutic goals, medication dosing, potential side effects, and special precautions are carefully explained. When treatment focuses primarily on the use of medications, a follow-up appointment is made with the CPS.

The patient is invited to contact the CPS if medication-related problems arise (most of the questions patients have after they leave a medical office relate to medication effects).

At revisits, the CPS measures blood pressure and pulse; records changes in headache frequency, intensity and characteristics; surveys the patient's response to and compliance with medication; and notes the occurrence of side effects. If the quality of the headache has changed or if there are other indications, the CPS consults the physician; otherwise, the CPS decides whether to add or delete medication, change the dose or timing, or change the route of administration. The time spent discussing treatment enhances patient confidence, thus improving compliance and therapeutic outcome. The physician is informed of the patient's status, the recommended changes, and if appropriate, signs the prepared prescriptions.

The primary aspect of the CPS's involvement with patients relates to drug therapy, but other aspects of care are addressed because a good overall plan is the keystone to reducing the dose and number of required medications. The relationship of headache to exercise, sleep, diet, and emotional stresses at home and work are addressed. The PharmD's training in nutrition, exercise, and non-medication therapies provides excellent background for this work. In our practice, the CPS is helpful to:

- Patients who have failed standard narcotic-based headache regimens. These patients require careful dosing of oral pain medications and close monitoring to avoid overuse and abuse. The CPS maintains contact with prescribing physicians and retail pharmacists to monitor drug consumption.
- Patients who require regular injections of narcotics. Here the CPS seeks alternative administration routes and doses to minimize injections.
- Patients who require potentially toxic medications such as monoamine oxidase inhibitors. The CPS monitors the use of these drugs and provides ongoing education to assure maximal compliance and safety.
- 4) Patients who are using several medications, sometimes prescribed by several different physicians. The CPS evaluates the compatibility and interaction of the medications and coordinates therapy among clinicians.

A small percentage of our patients require hospitalization because of their head pain. In those cases, the CPS helps coordinate in-hospital interdisciplinary treatment. Staff nurses need (and we provide) education about the special needs of headache patients and the nature of our treatment approach. Each CPS and physician makes hospital rounds and contributes to the adjustment of the treatment plans. The CPS educates inpatients on the mechanism of headache and the role of medications including anticipated benefits, potential adverse effects, and appropriate administration techniques.

Patient acceptance of the CPS has been excellent. Most patients appreciate the extra time, education, and expertise he provides; they are comforted by having a "medication specialist" working with them to adjust medications. The rate of cancellations or "no-shows" for office visits to the CPS is the same as for the attending physician.

Quality control and outcome evaluation are essential. Our current plans call for the CPS to evaluate the outcomes of present treatment methods and to develop treatment algorithms that incorporate medication costs, treatment effectiveness, effect on co-morbid illnesses, potential side effects of drugs, and ease of administration.

The Future

Having a clinical pharmacist working beside a private physician in an office setting is a new idea, but one that is logical and timely. It re-establishes a collegial clinical relationship that improves patient care, increases physician efficiency, and is cost effective.

We believe that a CPS can be most helpful in settings where medication treatment is intensive—as in centers treating diabetes mellitus, hypertension, congestive heart failure, seizure disorders, or renal failure. In those settings, extensive training in pharmacology and therapeutics makes the CPS a more appropriate physician extender than a NP or PA. Use of CPSs would permit NPs and PAs to serve in primary-care settings where their special skills in assessment could be best utilized and would help ease the current shortage of physician extenders. Currently there are four to six times as many jobs available as there are PAs and NPs to fill them.⁸

In the future, the niche filled by CPSs, PAs, and NPs will reflect the quality of their care, their productivity, and cost-effectiveness. Already we know that the quality of care NPs and PAs provide is indistinguishable from that of physicians when process and outcome are used as indicators. 9,10 Productivity of PAs and physicians is similar. 11,12 authorized broad prescribing and practice privileges for NPs who are presently empowered to prescribe in 44 other states. ¹³ As the role of the CPS becomes better delineated, states should authorize prescribing privileges for these particularly well-qualified individuals. As with PAs, prescribing privileges should require the agreement and supervision of a responsible, licensed physician.

Conclusions

The challenge of delivering health care services to an increasing number of patients and simultaneously slowing the growth of health care costs demands new approaches. Cost savings of up to 20% can be realized by using physician extenders to deliver health care services. 14,15 Use of a physician extender can increase visits to an individual physician's office by 30%-40% and at substantial cost savings. 16

Although yearly salaries of PAs ($36,000-$55,000) and NPs ($33,000-$48,000), 8,17,18 are lower than the mean salary of hospital pharmacists ($51,840), the salaries of PharmDs is one-half to one-fourth that of physicians ($100,000-$192,000). The salary cost of CPSs can be justified by their special training in pharmacotherapy. Their added value increases directly with complexity of medicinal treatments.

The clinical pharmacotherapy specialist is an under-recognized and thus under-utilized physician extender. At a time when the complexity of pharmacologic agents is increasing, the expertise of a CPS can both improve patient care and enhance the cost-effectiveness of treatment. They are ideally suited to work in medication-intensive medical practices. We urge the expanded training, certification, and utilization of CPSs, and we favor legislation that would permit them to prescribe medications in coordination with a licensed physician.

A Systematic Approach to the Health Care Delivery Problem in Buncombe County, North Carolina

Suzanne Landis, MD, MPH, Philip Davis, MD, and Cynthia Janes, PhD

The Buncombe County Medical Society (BCMS) believes that private physicians can catalyze a systematic and collaborative analysis of the health care needs of the underserved. The BCMS has received a one-year planning grant from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, one of 22 awards throughout the nation. The goals of the project, "Health Partners: Today and Tomorrow," are: 1) to identify and quantify the numbers of medically underserved individuals in Buncombe County; and 2), in partnership with community members, hospitals, businesses, and government, to design and implement solutions to the problems of health care access, especially primary health care. Based on efforts already begun, the BCMS believes that our community is ready for a collaborative attack on its unmet health care needs.

The Health Partners Project

Buncombe County is located in western North Carolina along Interstate Route 40. The county's population is 175,821, approximately 10% of whom are non-white and 14%, elderly. The county has two not-for-profit, acute care hospitals that share a common medical staff. One-fourth of the 409 physicians practicing in the county are primary care physicians; nearly all (96%) of the physicians practicing in the county are members of the BCMS.

The Mountain Area Health Education Center (MAHEC) is a partner of the BCMS in the project. MAHEC's mission is to improve the quality, geographic distribution, and retention of health care professionals in western North Carolina. It is part of the NC AHEC system, a national model for regional community-focused programs for the education of health professionals. MAHEC provides expertise in community survey methods, Drs. Landis and Janes are with the Mountain Area Health Education Center, 118 Weaver Blvd., Asheville 28804. Drs. Landis and Davis are members of the Buncombe County Medical Society, Asheville 28801. This work is supported in part by a grant from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation.

The county's three major hospitals (Memorial Mission, St. Joseph's, and Thoms Rehabilitation) have supported our project by sending representatives to the planning group, by providing communication expertise, by financial assistance, and through a grant from the Duke Endowment. They are involved in an assessment of community needs in western North Carolina.

Existing Community Health Efforts

The BCMS has a record of leadership in improving access to health care for the underserved. The Doctors' Medical Clinic, (a collaboration of the BCMS, a consortium of religious congregations, and the hospitals) provides free medical care and medications to eligible patients. Staffed by volunteers, the clinic is open three evenings each week and sees 75 patient visits per week. About half of the Medical Society members serve at the clinic and accept referrals in their offices.

HIV-infected persons have several options for primary care services. A physician referral list created by a local physician allows the Western North Carolina AIDS Project to refer clients to the 94% of primary care physicians in the community who have hospital privileges. An HIV Wellness Center provides an additional source of medical care, social support, and educational programs. BCMS members serve as volunteer staff at the facility.

A hospital-based immunization program provides hospitalized patients with needed vaccines near the time of discharge, regardless of their ability to pay. This program demonstrates the commitment of these hospitals to preventive care.

Children First is a county-wide coalition to improve children's well-being; health is one of seven areas of its focus. Children First has successfully established a free immunization program at a summer street festival attended by more than 300,000 citizens annually.

Health Care Needs

In spite of all present efforts, there is still a substantial unmet need for care. Seven of Buncombe County's 38 census tracts are designated as medically underserved areas. The population of the six urban and one rural areas totals more than 16,000; the income of over half these residents is less than twice the poverty level, and that of over a quarter is below the poverty level. Seasonal or part-time employment in the county's large tourism industry offers only minimum wages and no health insurance coverage, greatly compounding the number of underserved.

The Asheville-Buncombe Community Christian Ministry (ABCCM) estimates that 30,000 Buncombe County men, women, and children have incomes below 200% of the federal poverty guideline and arc completely without health coverage. The ABCCM Doctors' Medical Clinic meets slightly more than 10% of the county need (and then generally only to provide an initial assessment). A 1993 needs assessment by the United Way identified several problem areas in the county: insufficient health screening, diagnostic services, AIDS prevention education, and prescription medicines for the poor and homeless.

Many of those who receive health care do so through channels not designed for primary care. The two acute care hospitals are the most obvious entries into the health care system and are the sites of least appropriate use. For example, Memorial Mission Hospital, the region's tertiary medical center, reported in 1993 that 35% of the 44,000 visits to its emergency room were for problems that could have been handled in a primary care physician's office. The 15,000 nonemergent visits were made by privately insured (33%), Medicaid (17%), Medicare (11%), and self or no-pay patients (30%). St. Joseph's Hospital reported that 40% of its 33,000 ER visits in 1993 could have been handled by a primary care physician. Of these 13,200 visits, 39% were privately insured, 11% by Medicaid, 28% by Medicare, and 22% were self-insured or nopay visits. St. Joseph's Hospital operates four outlying urgent care centers that see approximately 80,000 patients annually, 32,000 of whom could have been seen by a primary care provider. In total, at least 60,000 visits to the emergency rooms and urgent care centers could have been managed appropriately in the offices of private physicians.

The Buncombe County Health Department (BCHD) operates a Healthy Children and Teens Program that provides health screening for Medicaid recipients under 20 years of age. Figures from 1993 indicate that only 4,718 of the 7,465 individuals who agreed to have the screening were actually examined. The BCHD also operates an adult primary care center (APCC). Between November 1993 and January 1994, the APCC recorded 3,180 patient visits, most (70%) of which were by females and people under 65 years of age. Payment for this service is largely through Medicaid (22%), Medicare (16%), and self-pay (34%). Most (75%) of the self-pay patients are charged on a sliding scale, and due to low income, many pay nothing.

In 1993, the Buncombe County Commissioners undertook a major productivity study of all county departments looking for ways to reduce expenditures. One major recommendation was to reduce or consolidate several of the primary care clinics operated by BCHD. This proposal would, if implemented, further erode access to primary care for many of the most vulnerable members of our community.

Problems of access in Buncombe County seem to center around primary care. An informal survey indicates that patients who can get in to see a primary care physician have relatively little trouble being seen by specialists to whom the primary care physician refers. For this reason our plan to improve access to care will focus on increasing access to primary care services.

Currently, 39 individual and group physician practices in Buncombe County participate in Carolina Access, a managed care system for Medicaid patients. Carolina Access is designed to provide efficient and effective health care delivery to Medicaid patients. New and renewing Medicaid recipients automatically become enrolled in Carolina Access; there are currently more than 18,000 enrolled recipients, 6,000 more than can be seen by participating physicians!

Barriers to Medical Care

Substantial barriers to obtaining primary care exist in Buncombe County. A March 1994 survey by the BCMS identified the following: 1) too few primary care physicians serve the population (only three of 22 respondents were unconditionally accepting new Medicaid patients; only eight of the 22 were accepting new uninsured patients); 2) too few primary care physicians accept adequate numbers of Medicaid patients (on average, private physician charges to Medicaid represented only 6% of total charges); 3) too few primary care practices are open during evenings and on weekends (40% of practices were open during weekday evenings and 31% on weekends). The lack of convenient hours may encourage patients who are working or cannot find child care to use emergency departments for routine health care.

Lack of transportation plays a significant role in limiting access to private physicians. In 1990, close to 10% (6,971) of occupied housing units in the county had no vehicles available; most of the residents without transportation were over 65 years of age. During planning for MAHEC's Mountain Area Perinatal Substance Abuse Program (MAPSAP), pregnant substance abusers identified lack of transportation and child care as major barriers to prenatal care and substance abuse treatment. MAPSAP mothers' advocates reported that they spent a significant amount of time providing transportation to this high-risk group.

Thus, despite the existence of a primary care facility at the BCHD, a free clinic voluntarily staffed by private practice physicians, and the development of the Carolina Access system, substantial unmet needs remain. The successes of the BCMS in getting practitioners to donate medical services provide evidence that the county's physicians understand the need for improved care and are willing to participate in meeting the health care needs of the area's underserved.

Strategy of the Planning Grant

Our primary goal for the period from August 1, 1994, to July 31, 1995, is to develop a comprehensive strategy for expanding the primary health care services provided by private practice physicians to Buncombe County's medically underserved citizens. We have assembled an advocacy planning group comprised of private practitioners, agencies involved in health care delivery to the underserved, agencies providing the underserved with other services (such as with food and shelter), representatives of underserved populations (such as the HIV-infected, elderly, working uninsured), county commissioners, and local business groups. After a community-wide needs assessment, we will outline a physician-led plan that maximizes use of private practitioners, addresses public policy issues, identifies funding sources, and provides for process evaluation.

BCMS and MAHEC have already developed and pretested a phone survey based on the Centers for Disease Control Behavioral Risk Factor Questionnaire to identify the specific needs of the medically underserved and the barriers to comprehensive health care. In addition, in order to better understand the identified needs, BCMS will host professionally facilitated "town meetings" in the medically underserved areas of Buncombe County. We will invite community members to freely discuss their perceived needs and to brainstorm possible solutions for them. We will also hold focus group meetings with elderly, HIV-infected, homeless, and working uninsured residents to further clarify barriers to medical care.

We will outline a plan in which physicians, through the BCMS, lead the way to improved access to health care using financial support from businesses, insurers, and government agencies. Subdivisions of the planning group ("study groups") will review accumulated data and present recommendations to the planning group for discussion and to prioritize solutions. Eventually, a comprehensive strategy will be drafted, refined, and presented to physicians, hospital leaders, government agencies, private insurers, the business community, and health and human services agencies to solicit formal commitment.

Enhancing Physician Participation

How can we enhance physician participation in the process of needs identification and provision? The BCMS newsletter will report quarterly updates on the project and medical staff meetings at the hospitals will review the planning strategy and solicit concerns and possible solutions. Drs. Davis and Landis, project directors, will discuss problems and concerns of physicians in focus groups so that physicians can visualize their role in providing care to the currently underserved. Summarized minutes of planning group meetings will be sent to all physicians, and we will hold a forum to discuss the results of the phone survey, town meetings, and focus groups with physicians.

We propose a legislative/insurance study group to include representatives of county and state government, large and small businesses, physicians, hospitals, and insurers. This study group will develop financial and political strategies that can be readily incorporated into the overall plan and will assure the other study groups and the BCMS that all recommendations are financially and politically feasible. The Children First Collaborative has successfully used a similar format and is interested in working with our physician-led initiative to address children's health care needs. In addition, large and small businesses have formed two health coalitions, both of which are interested in working with our planning group.

Our current efforts to enhance care for the needy are locally financed, almost exclusively by the health services sector. St. Joseph's and Memorial Mission hospitals, both partners in the project, have expressed their commitment to developing a comprehensive continuum of care. These hospitals and their physician colleagues are the most feasible sources of private funds, but other local organizations and businesses represent a previously untapped area of support for the expanded services we envision. Finally, we continue to attract support from NC-based foundations for health services projects.

Project Management

The project is administered by the BCMS; Drs. Davis and Landis serve as project directors. Dr. Davis is the driving force behind the development and successful implementation of the ABCCM Doctors' Medical Clinic. He has practiced obstetrics and gynecology in Asheville for 22 years and is well known to the private physician community. Dr. Landis, who has practiced at MAHEC for seven years, is director of the Division of Family Medicine at MAHEC and is experienced in community health planning. Cynthia Janes, PhD, the project coordinator, has extensive training and experience in project development, implementation, and evaluation; she oversees the planning process, supervises staff, ensures that elements of the planning process are carried out on schedule, and analyzes data. Kendall Hale is the only full-time staff employee. She is responsible for daily management and coordination of the project and for networking among agencies, physicians, and the community. A project management team meets on a weekly basis to monitor the implementation of planning activities.

Buncombe County has pressing unmet health needs. In keeping with our long history of creative solutions to health problems, our private physicians, in concert with the community, have begun a systematic and planned approach to health care delivery. To achieve our goals, we have devised a comprehensive plan to assess health needs, prioritize them, and design solutions that incorporate the energies and ideas of a broad spectrum of physicians, underserved people, health professionals and agencies, insurers, and legislators.

The Sun and Your Skin

PROTECTING YOURSELF FROM THE SUN ARE YOU ALLERGIC TO YOUR SUNSCREEN?

William M. Hendricks, MD

Sunscreens are a remarkable group of chemicals that have revolutionized our ability to protect ourselves from the sun. When applied to the skin they help shield and protect it from the sun's rays. Unfortunately, some people may develop an allergy to one of the chemicals in their sunscreens. If this happens to you, your sunscreen can cause an itchy, red rash or even make you more sensitive to sunlight. Sometimes an allergy to one of the chemicals in sunscreens can be very subtle, and some people who think they are allergic to sunlight may actually be allergic to one of the ingredients in their sunscreen.

There are basically two types of sunscreens—chemical sunscreens and physical sunscreens. If you look at Figure 1, you will see the main ingredients found in each type of sunscreen.

Chemical sunscreens are responsible for almost all allergic reactions to sunscreens, while physical sunscreens almost never cause problems. Physical sunscreens, such as the white coat of zinc oxide that some lifeguards use to protect their noses and lips, however, can be unsightly. Fortunately some of the newer sunscreens are not as noticeable since they combine the physical sunscreen titanium dioxide with chemical sunscreens.

If You Think You Are Allergic

If you want to do a simple patch test to see if your sunscreen is causing problems, use a pen to mark a small area on your forearm no larger that a quarter. Then apply a tiny dab of the sunscreen to the area and rub it completely into your skin. Do this twice a day for three days. If you are allergic to the sunscreen, the area usually will become red and itchy. If you do not get a reaction to the sunscreen, repeat the test making certain that the area is exposed to sunlight. There are some allergic reactions to sunscreens that occur only after the sunscreen is exposed to sunlight.

If you break out in a rash from a sunscreen before or after sun exposure, discontinue it. If your sunscreen caused the rash, it usually will appear only on the areas where you applied the sunscreen. Please remember, however, that there are many other reasons why you can have skin problems when you get out in the sun, unless you have confirmed your allergy with a patch test, check with your personal physician or dermatologist.

If you think your sunscreen caused the rash, try switching to another brand that does not contain the same ingredients. That's where Figure 1 comes in handy. All of the most important active ingredients in sunscreens are listed there. Try to identify the groups of ingredients found in your sunscreen.

If the manufacturer uses chemical names, look for the key word. For example, 2-hydroxy-4-methoxybenzophenone is a benzophenone, 2-ethyl-hexyl-p-methoxycinnamate is a cinnamate, triethanolamine salicylate is a salicylate. If you are still having problems, ask your pharmacist or physician for help.

The important point to remember is that if you are allergic to one of the members of any group of chemicals in your sunscreen, you will need to avoid the other members of that group.

PABA and PABA Esters

The most common sunscreen problem is an allergy to PABA or one of the PABA esters. If you are allergic to this, switch to a PABA-free sunscreen. People who are allergic to benzocaine, paraphenylenediamine (used in some hair dyes), procaine, sulfonamides, thiazides, or other related compounds may also be allergic to PABA or PABA esters, and should try to use PABA-free sunscreens.

Benzophenones

Other people may be allergic to one of the benzophenones. If you are, you will need to avoid dioxybenzone, oxybenzone and benzophenone 3. Usually people who are allergic to this can use a PABA or PABA ester-based sunscreen, although there are a few unfortunate people who are allergic to both PABA and benzophenone. If you are one of them, choose a PABA-free, benzophenone-free sunscreen or use a physical sunscreen such as Neutrogena Chemical-Free sunscreen.

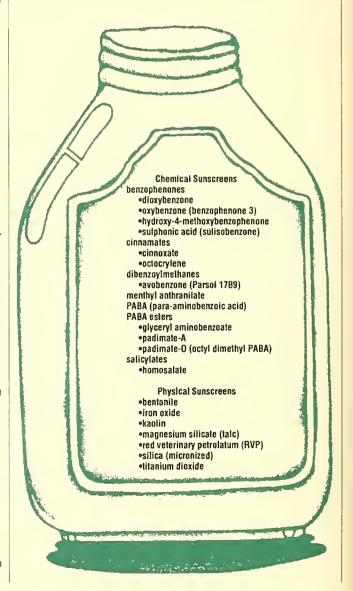

'Chemical sunscreens are responsible for almost all allergic reactions to sunscreens, while physical sunscreens almost never cause problems.'

Other Ingredients

Occasionally some people are allergic to aloe vera, cinnamates, cocoa butter, fragrances, lanolin, menthyl anthranilate, Parsol 1789, preservatives (such as imidazolidinyl urea and parabens), salicylates, or vitamin E in their sunscreen. If there is a question about what you are allergic to in your sunscreen, ask your physician to test you to para-aminobenzoic acid (PABA), benzophenone, and other chemicals contained in sunscreens.

Read the labels on sunscreens carefully. Several companies manufacture different chemical sunscreens under very similar trade names. If you are confused, ask your pharmacist or physician for help.

Getting a Great Tan Without Damaging Your Skin

ARTIFICIAL TANNING PRODUCTS

William M. Hendricks, MD

Most of us already know that the sun's rays are not good for our skin and that tanning beds age and cook the proteins in our skin. How, then, can you get a great tan without damaging your skin?

The answer is self-tanning products or sunless tanners that contain dihydroxyacetone. These lotions, sprays, or gels do not require the sun's rays to give your skin a "sunless tan." Dihydroxyacetone has been around for a long time and has been shown to be very safe.

The original formulations, however, turned the skin an eye-arresting orange-brown color and made the elbows and knees appear brown and dirty. Fortunately, today's self-tanning products have been greatly improved and leave the skin a more natural appearing brown or golden brown color.

Dihydroxyacetone, the active ingredient in self-tanning products, combines with the topmost layer of your skin (the keratin layer) causing a browning reaction. The brown color develops like photographic film over the course of several hours and cannot be washed off. Instead, it is gradually shed along with your top layer of skin over two to four days. In fact, if you vigorously rub your skin, you will remove this outer layer along with your "tan." Dihydroxyacetone is not a stain or a dye. Bronzers, on the other hand, are dyes that instantly color the skin but can be washed off with soap and water.

What should I ask for?

Most self-tanning products contain 3% to 5% dihydroxyacetone, although the percentage is rarely shown on the bottle or packaging. Instead, many products are labeled for "fair skin" or "medium-dark skin," or for "light," "medium-dark," or "dark tans." There are even products that advertise that they have a "self-adjusting color." Usually the higher the concentration of dihydroxyacetone, the darker the "tan." The darkness of the brown color may also be intensified by repeated applications. People with medium complexions (not fair or dark) seem to like the colors produced by sunless tanners the best, while fair or darkly complected people may not find them acceptable.

If you want to test your skin to be certain of a self-tanner, apply a small amount to your forearm and rub it in so that it covers an area about the size of a quarter. Wait two to three hours and see if the color is acceptable. You may reapply some more self-tanner to the area if you are not satisfied and check the site again in two to three hours. If you do not like the result, try a different product. Although all self-tanners contain the same active ingredients, certain products may work better for you than others.

Some self-tanners also contain a sunscreen (see Figure 2). These products can give you a false sense of security, since your "tan" usually lasts for several days, while the sunscreen's effectiveness may last only several hours. Therefore, you should either reapply the self-tanner with sunscreen or apply a sunscreen over your "tan" before you get out in the sun. If you choose one of these products, buy one with an SPF of at least 15.

Finally, if you are really anxious to have a tanned look, there are some products that contain a bronzer along with a self-tanner. These products color your skin so that you will immediately appear darker and also contain a self-tanner that works over the course of two to three hours to darken your skin.

How do you apply self-tanning products?

First, read and then carefully follow all of the instructions on the bottle. Here are a few tips:

- 1) Bathe or shower and then gently pat your skin dry. Some people may want to use a wash cloth or loofah pad to gently exfoliate their skin.
- 2) Evenly apply the self-tanner or sunless tanner rubbing it gently into the skin. Use it sparingly around the hairline, eyebrows, knees, elbows, ankles, knuckles, and nails. Remember that thick skin usually has more keratin and will turn a darker shade of brown. If your skin is rough,

- irritated, thickened, freckled, mottled, or aged, the self-tanner may not go on evenly.
- 3) Avoid contact with your eyes.
- 4) Immediately wash your hands with soap and water or rinse and dry with a towel after each application. If you don't, you will have brown fingers and palms.
- 5) Self-tanners can stain clothing and fabrics. Avoid contact until the product has dried on your skin.
- 6) Reapply the self-tanner to your skin every two to four hours until your skin is the right shade of tan. It usually takes two to four applications to get it right, although this may vary depending upon anatomical site. For example, the face may require fewer applications than the extremities.
- 7) To avoid streaking, reapply the self-tanner after swimming, toweling, or prolonged perspiration.
- 8) Most self-tanners must be reapplied daily or every other - day, or your tan will disappear within two to four days.

- 9) If skin irritation or a rash develops, discontinue the self-tanner.
- 10) Use a sunscreen with a SPF of at least 15 over your self-tanner unless it already contains one. Although dihydoxyacetone blocks some ultraviolet rays (mainly long wavelength UVA rays), your tan will not protect you from ultraviolet rays that burn and age your skin.

Warning: Beware of tan accelerators that contain tyrosine, melanin, or riboflavin, since they do not work. Tanning promoters (available in Europe) that have 5-methyoxpsoralen (bergapten) or oil of bergamot may cause sunburns. Tanning pills containing canthaxanthin have been banned in the United States because they caused retinal problems, hepatitis, and bone marrow problems. Do not use them!

"Urinate in the Cup, Doctor"

Editor's note: The following editorial on pre-employment drug testing of new House Staff at Duke University Medical Center was written by Edward C. Halperin, MD, deputy editor of the Journal and a professor in Duke's Department of Radiation Oncology. To initiate dialogue among our readers, we asked five physicians to provide their views on the topic as well. Their comments, listed alphabetically, follow. We encourage readers to join in the debate by letter or fax (919/286-9219).

On November 21, 1994, the Executive Committee of the Duke Hospital Medical Staff passed a regulation stating that all new house staff at Duke will undergo "entry substance abuse testing. This testing will be a condition of the employment process. Any applicant who refuses to submit for screening or whose drug screen results in a confirmed positive result will have his or her offer of appointment rescinded." In practical terms the Duke policy means that each July, entering interns, residents, and postgraduate fellows will be subjected to urine, blood, or breath tests for alcohol, marijuana, cocaine, amphetamines, phencyclidine, and opiates. Those who test definitely positive will be refused employment.

Proper urine screening for drugs of abuse requires that specimens be collected under direct observation of urine flow from urethra to container. In some federal agencies, a "monitor of the same sex as the employee remains close at hand to listen for the normal sounds of urination. Dye is added to the toilet water to prevent the employee from using the water to adulterate the sample." Some corporations measure urine temperature in an attempt to detect specimen substitution. No matter what system is used, a completely documented chain of custody must be provided for every specimen so that the evidence of a positive specimen will stand up in the face of any subsequent litigation. I presume, therefore, that entering house officers will be welcomed to Duke University Medical Center with a cup and the opportunity to urinate while being observed to ensure an unadulterated specimen.

Pre-Employment Drug Testing: Pro

Several arguments favor pre-employment drug testing. I'll summarize four:

 Those who support testing intend to apply it ultimately to all new hires at Duke, not just house officers. They argue that many industries require drug testing. If Duke Hospital does not test, then substance-impaired employees might gravitate toward Duke (the "Duke will become an employment refuge for addicts" argument³).

- Pre-employment drug testing sends a clear message that such behavior is not acceptable at Duke.
- 3) House officers and medical students have ready access to drugs in the course of their work. We need to protect these young people when, at a particularly vulnerable stage of their lives, they may succumb to the temptations of drug abuse.
- For their own good, as well as patient safety, addicts ought to be rooted out.

My sources at Duke report that pre-employment testing is only the first step. The proposition is being floated to extend suspicionless testing to clinical faculty on a random basis.

Pre-Employment Drug Testing: Con

There are compelling arguments against suspicionless drug testing. The Fourth Amendment of the US Constitution, ratified in 1791, states unequivocally that "the right of the people to be secure in their person, houses, paper, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." By a legal sleight of hand you can argue that a private, non-governmental agency like Duke Hospital is not bound by the right to privacy clause, but the violation of the law's spirit is still clear.

Recent US Supreme Court decisions define the relationship between employment drug testing and "search and seizures." The Supreme Court has held that obtaining blood and breath tests for drugs infringes upon an individual's reasonable expectations of privacy. 1.5.6 The subsequent chemical analyses of blood and urine samples, to obtain additional data, is a further invasion of privacy. A federal appeals court stated:

"There are few activities in our society more personal or private than the passing of urine. Most people describe it [with] euphemisms if they talk about it at all. It is a function traditionally performed without public observation; indeed its performance in public is generally prohibited by law as well as social custom."

Few people are more vulnerable to pressure from superiors than interns. What a way to welcome new medical graduates to the world of medicine! "Open your white coats. Drop your trousers. Pull up your skirts. Ladies and gentlemen, welcome to your internship and residency program. Let's fill those cups up!"

Given the ramifications of this policy, it would be nice if there were a shred of evidence that drug testing of unsuspected physicians had one iota of impact on patients' safety. There isn't any. A report from Columbia University's Presbyterian Hospital, which has carried out drug testing for years, notes two positive tests in 791 new house officers—and at least one of the two was known to have a drug problem before entering the program at Presbyterian!

Without question, casual drug users can modify their behavior enough to sabotage the test if they know the date of testing in advance. How are we going to protect against specimen mix up, transcription errors, and phony specimens? Would we ever think of testing, without the specimen provider's knowledge, for pregnancy, diabetes, anti-epileptic drugs, or other disorders? Will the plaintiff's bar be able to obtain "confidential" drug testing information for use in malpractice suits? And who will bear the significant cost of urine and breath screening and the spectroscopy needed for confirmation?

It is pretty clear what is going on. Hospitals and businesses want to show they are serious about "the war on drugs." They want to demonstrate just how serious they are by a very public act. Duke has joined the ranks of other institutions in a public execution of our constitutional right to privacy (to say nothing of societal standards of collegiality and human dignity) to generate a symbolic opposition to drug use in the absence of supportive scientific data. La Shame!

James A. Bryan, II, MD, Professor, Division of General Medicine and Clinical Epidemiology, Department of Medicine, UNC School of Medicine, Chapel Hill

I appreciate the opportunity to comment on mandatory random drug testing for all hospital staff. As we proceed into the "brave Newt world" and are reclassified, not as professionals but as "organization men and women," I wonder about definition, purpose, limit, and utility.

The subject of "drug testing" reminds me that when our society thinks of substances that change personality, physical capacity, judgment, responsiveness, or mental capacity, it usually thinks first of illegal drugs. The list of materials to be tested for is defined by policymakers. I wonder about the infinite number of other conditions and medications that affect human attributes (hypoglycemics, antihypertensives, psychotropics, steroids) not to mention conditions (fatigue, anger, beeper toxicity, dealing with managed care) that make physicians operate at less than optimal level.

I suggest that we have random testing for flexibility, grip strength, and reaction time, and that a stress ECG be performed at least quarterly. Annual psychological testing looking for a significant increase on the depression scale or decrease in the I.Q. would also be helpful as would a measure of total body fat (make that a measure of head fat in the policymakers).

Athletes are tested so that no single performer will get undue advantage by using an enhancing chemical. We in the health care professions should ourselves be working to stay as healthy as we can for the good of our patients. This would certainly include avoiding any materials that would compromise our performance in either the short or the long run. I am sorry that individual responsibility and integrity can't seem to accomplish that and that the organization people think that mandatory manipulation is necessary.

William R. Bullock, MD, First Charlotte Physicians, Charlotte, and Member, NCMS Drug Abuse Committee

Duke Hospital is to be commended for taking the step of requiring drug testing for all new house staff. In so doing, it is not only protecting itself, but recognizing a fact of life. I think it would be more reasonable for Dr. Halperin to look at this as a general health screening rather than an abuse of personal rights or an invasion of privacy. Although there still may be discussion about the mechanism by which the screening will be carried out and what will be done with the information obtained, I hope that those who test positive will be directed into treatment programs of some type. Addiction, whether to drugs, behaviors, or alcohol, is treatable, and we health care professionals suffer from this disease in greater numbers than the general population. Resistance to random or pre-employment screening, or attempts to confuse the problem with the idea of "rooting out" the addict, only add to the denial of hospitals and the medical profession in general about the addicted individuals in our midst.

George W. Jackson, MD, Associate Clinical Professor, Community and Family Medicine, Chief, Division of Occupational and Environmental Medicine, and Director, Employee Occupational Health Services, Duke University, Durham

On July 1, 1995, Duke University Hospital will begin screening all employees hired to work and all physicians credentialed to practice in the Hospital for substance abuse. This process will occur for all newly hired physicians whether there is suspicion of a problem or not. Among the reasons for testing are the need for a nondiscriminatory approach (if housekeepers are tested then physicians must also be), and the fact that physicians do occasionally have substance abuse problems.

The history of inappropriate use of drugs by physicians is well documented and long. Osler described the problems of trying to assist physicians with the "morphia habit" in 1890. Recent self-report surveys of the use of intoxicants by physicians show varying results. Hughes reported that physicians were less likely to use eigarettes and illicit substances than matched respondents in a large national survey, but were more likely to use alcohol, minor opiates, and benzodiazepines.¹ A survey of 260 anesthesiologists revealed that 16% acknowledged a history of substance dependence (65% alcohol, 21% other drugs, 14% both alcohol and other drugs).² The screening of 791 physicians prior to joining the Columbia Presbyterian Hospital house staff between 1987 and 1990 revealed two cases of substance abuse.3 This is a low rate (0.25%) compared to preplacement testing of other work groups (where 3% to 5% test positive in some studies). We can be thankful that possible care errors related to cognitive problems were prevented and the two physicians got help with a potentially disabling dependence.

In North Carolina, 400 physicians participated in the Medical Society's program for impaired physicians between 1988 and 1993. Most of these physicians (251) had problems with alcohol or other drugs. Unfortunately, most had not voluntarily made their problem known or addressed it with proper treatment. For this, the intervention of some external agency was necessary.

Substance abuse by physicians is a particular problem because of easy drug access and the highly independent, unsupervised work of most doctors. Clearly, the most efficient way to identify impaired physicians is by performance assessment. This approach does not invade the civil rights of physicians who do not abuse drugs. Unfortunately, we do not have functional performance measures for most physician activities, and colleagues, who may be in the best position to observe diminished performance, are frequently unwilling to speak up.

Substance abuse screening at the time of hiring is one approach to the problem. It is not the most effective because it applies only to a limited group, occurs only at one point in time, and can be circumvented with a little planning. "For-cause" screening is highly useful when adequate and functional performance criteria are actively applied. Random periodic screening of the entire workforce is the most invasive but the most effective. This approach results in very low levels of substance abuse in a work group, but is very difficult to implement.

The process of substance abuse screening requires care to minimize errors and the invasion of personal privacy. Direct observation of urine exiting the urethra is necessary only in those rare situations in which an attempt has been made to provide an invalid specimen. Chain of custody handling and medical review of all positive tests by a specifically trained physician are used to reduce the possibility of error and invasion of privacy in cases involving a prescribed medication.

The problem of physician substance abuse needs a comprehensive approach. Education about this problem is now occurring in medical school, residencies, and in some continuing medical education programs. A professionally run employee/staff assistance program that can provide confidential assessment and referral is an important element. A vigorous program for impaired physicians conducted by the Medical Society is an essential component to a comprehensive effort. Most importantly, physician colleagues must be willing to address impaired performance (rather than hoping the problem will disappear) and be aware of the resources for assistance. This will make the most difference.

The loss of individual rights and invasion of personal privacy are significant negative aspects of the attempt by hospitals and other health care institutions to deal with the safety risks posed by substance use by their workers (including physicians). We need to minimize these infringements of our freedom and assure that errors, if any, favor the individual.

Many of us remember when scanning of our bodies and our luggage was not routine prior to boarding an airplane. Now we feel conspicuous, annoyed, and violated when we must stand aside and have a hand-held scanner run over our bodies. But we have accepted this invasion even though the risks of hijacking and bombing are rare events in the United States. Substance abuse screening, however, is a necessary invasion of privacy that will address a scrious social problem.

No reader of the Journal has enjoyed, appreciated, or been stimulated more by Dr. Halperin's contributions than I. I agree enthusiastically with his opinions and his final admonition ("Shame!"), but for very different reasons. Specifically, I think his legal basis is flawed and his academic justification suspect, but the implications of the issue are far more threatening than maybe even he realizes.

Legal basis. Attempts to raise the issue of suspicionless drug testing to a constitutional level have failed miserably. In Skinner, Van Raab, and Sitz, the three cases Dr. Halperin cites, the Supreme Court came down heavily on the side of testing. The Court did not, as Dr. Halperin infers, award constitutional protection to the plaintiffs. Duke Hospital is not bound by "the right to privacy clause," very simply because there ain't no such animal. The word privacy does not appear anywhere in our Constitution. Previous claims of a constitutionally protected right to privacy, which emerged during the "romantic" years of the court, principally led by the Bobbsey twins (Douglas and Blackmun), were brought under the theoretical penumbra of the Ninth Amendment, which states that "the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

Although remarkably successful in its day in deciding potentially inflammatory issues such as birth control and abortion, the notion that privacy is a fundamental, constitutionally protected right retained by the people has an overwhelmingly tough battle meeting constitutional muster today. For example, Justice Scalia, usually supported by Justice Thomas, does not appear to believe that anything not spelled out "specifically" in the Constitution merits protection as a fundamental right. The liberty clauses in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, therefore, provide about the only possibility of raising privacy to a constitutional level now.

I am afraid the Duke house staff can take even less solace in the Fourth Amendment's stated right "to be secure in our persons, papers, and effects against unreasonable search and seizures," which sometimes is called "the right to be left alone" amendment. Note, however, that the critical word is unreasonable; recent decisions leave little doubt that our present courts see suspicionless search and seizure of body fluids from employees with responsibility for public welfare as eminently reasonable. Also, "probable cause" has taken a pretty severe beating in recent search and seizure cases. In the same vein, it is not accurate to describe restriction of Fourth Amendment protection to public institutions as legal sleight of hand. That issue has been faced squarely and comprehensively by the courts and the holdings are unequivocal. Consistent with perceived intent of the framers, constitutional protection against unreasonable search and seizure applies only to government intrusion.³

In summary, neither the Fourth nor the Ninth Amendments raise privacy to a constitutional level. Probably, the best legal defense against suspicionless drug testing that can be raised in 1995 is wrongful discharge as against public policy. Although unsuccessful in some jurisdictions, plaintiffs have prevailed in others.⁴

Justification. The notion that Duke Hospital wishes to "join business in showing seriousness about the war on drugs" also strikes me as being pitched a little high. I suspect a more accurate reason is to provide at least a modicum of legal defense for vicarious liability, should the need for such occur. Not guite so noble may be the desire to control, even intimidate, house officers early in their indentured service. As long as Duke enjoys its well-earned reputation as being one of the premiere teaching and research institutions, it really does not make any difference. They may not get an Ed Halperin or an Erle Peacock on the house staff, but free-thinkers are troublemakers—the last thing managed care managers need. And why should they when less than eight miles away the police blotter reveals that students in another "institution of higher learning" actually seem to enjoy passing water in public? Some of them are pretty good students, too.

Analysis. The most serious implications of the issue Dr. Halperin raises extend, in my judgment, far beyond Duke Hospital. Just as Duke, for no reason other than its being good, can do about what it pleases—even out-Hopkins Johns Hopkins—to control or intimidate house staff. So a multitude of managed care administrators, few of whom have taken a Hippocratic Oath (or any oath for that matter), can control and intimidate large numbers of practicing physicians. And they clearly will be able to do so with increasing efficiency as long as there is an oversupply of physicians, many of whom, if need be, will submit to abject tyranny in order to see patients and reap the perceived rewards therefrom. Who can reverse this shameful trend? Only the controlled, only the intimidated! Will they do so? Not yet; there simply is still too high a premium on prestige and remuneration—and far too many doctors willing to pay the price.

Of course, Dr. Halperin, I agree: "Shame!"—albeit for different reasons.

Harold R. Silberman, MD, Professor, Division of General Internal Medicine, Department of Medicine, Duke University Medical Center, Durham

At a time when my own freedoms as a physician are being eroded and constricted by the phenomenon of managed care and capitation, it is difficult for me to defend a process that invades another's personal freedom. However, I find myself doing just that. Doing it for the common good, because of the need to apply requirements evenly, and in the expectation that it will help my hospital function even better.

Several questions must be asked: Is there a problem? If so, does intoxication at work affect the care of patients? Does workplace testing elsewhere make Duke a haven for those who cannot pass the test? Can all these problems be addressed in a way that respects personal freedoms? The answers are: yes, yes, yes, and probably.

Duke University Hospital is committed to and promises patients the highest quality of care; it is dedicated to maintaining a safe and healthy workplace. Keeping the "Patients' Bill of Rights" is a tall order, one we cannot guarantee if even a tiny fraction of the workforce is impaired. The consumption of alcohol, the use of illicit substances, and the misuse of authorized drugs represent risks and very real threats to the Hospital's commitment. Thus, we have a classic conflict between personal liberties and public good. In support of testing to address the issue, the courts have increasingly ruled that threats to the public good trump personal liberties.

How can any hospital keep its promise to protect patients and workers? One approach is the so-called preplacement screening to prevent hard-core users from entering an institution's workforce. Obviously, the occasional clever user can, and will, circumvent the checkpoint by several days of abstinence.

How much will the new regulation cost and how will it be implemented? The cost will be better known after the system has run for a year or two, but a conservative estimate places first-year costs at $60,000 to $65,000. Potential employees will be informed about the policy and can decide whether to apply for jobs or to refuse the test and have the offer of employment rescinded. NC law states that prospective employees can be tested so long as specific guidelines are followed. There is an appeal process if one believes there has been a false-positive result. One final note about testing—it will require not only urinating in a cup but also spitting into a container. We will see whether these young doctors can do more than two things at the same time and well!

The policy will affect all new hires, not just interns, residents, and postgraduate fellows. After all, if we test employees doing mid-level tasks or menial labor, then we must also test the high-level, high-salaried folk as well. Why should the director, assistant director, or professor be allowed to show up to work slightly stoned or return from a lunch of martinis to coast in the office until 5 p.m., while the floor sweeper is fired for leaning on his broom after a few beers in the stairwell?

The leadership of Duke Hospital's Department of Human Resources and all clinical departmental chairs participated in the creation of this policy. After carefully considering the pros and cons and the moral and ethical implications, they voted overwhelmingly (11 to 1) in favor of a program of screening for "abuse" on November 21, 1994. Lest their action be viewed out of context, I would emphasize that the committee that created this policy recommended that other programs, currently in place to help manage the widening problems of alcoholism and substance abuse, be kept intact or expanded.

I hope that pre-employment screening plus continuing "for-cause" testing sends a strong message to current staff and prevents the hiring of undesirable new staff. Otherwise, random drug testing of all current employees will be the painful but logical next step. If we come to that, it will definitely be more difficult and expensive to implement, will bring a host of knotty issues to consider, and surely will raise to new heights the voice and pen of Dr. Halperin.

Mein Traum

The piece by Dr. Halperin—and the responses by his commentators—were strangely disturbing. I was—to be frank—surprised by the degree of support for the hospital's position, which according to Halperin and Peacock, is largely self-congratulatory but of no proven benefit despite its undisputed intrusiveness.

I could not sleep last night—and when I did, my dreams were dark and unnerving. I saw a shadowy figure in a black uniform with interlocked, twin silver "Ps" of the Krankenhaus- pisspolizei. I squirmed as he turned to speak—thick and guttural—did I understand what he said? "Those who have nothing to hide have nothing to fear?" No, that was my language, not his. I hadn't heard, clearly!

Then the figure snapped his fingers. Iron hands grasped my arms. I was thrust to the door. The door? I fell, headlong, as the jack-booted guard hissed in my ear: "Piss in der Becher...Doktor!"

Tell me I will wake up!

Shortness of Breath and "Refractory Pneumonia"

Delayed Diagnosis of Isolated Diaphragmatic Rupture

Thomas V. Clancy, MD, Charles R. Kays, DMD, MD, Peter N. Butler, MD, and J. Gary Maxwell, MD

Because of the traumatic forces involved, most patients with rupture of the diaphragm have other severe injuries. We report here a patient whose isolated diaphragmatic injury, the result of blunt trauma, eluded diagnosis for six years. When finally diagnosed, it was because of pulmonary symptoms related to compression by herniated viscera. Curiously, although the spleen and stomach are commonly found within traumatically created diaphragmatic hernias, hers contained neither organ.

Our Patient

In April 1994, a 20-year-old woman was referred to the New Hanover Regional Medical Center clinic in Wilmington for evaluation of "refractory pneumonia." She had complained of "shortness of breath" for several months, but had no cough, fever, weight loss, appetite, or bowel habit changes. For five years, she had been troubled by an intermittent "upset stomach," the symptoms of which increased on exertion and in the supine position.

Six years earlier, in February 1988, and while an unbelted front seat passenger in an automobile, she was in a crash involving lateral impact to the right front (passenger) side. She was evaluated in and released from the Emergency Department, but in December 1989, returned complaining of chest pain. ECG was normal, and chest x-ray demonstrated only a slight elevation of the left diaphragm.

In 1990, she "passed out for 10 minutes" at work and was diagnosed as having suffered a vasovagal episode. Later in 1990, she noted intermittent upper abdominal discomfort. In January 1991, she fell at home, striking the footboard of her bed; no significant injuries were identified. In December 1992, and seven months pregnant, she complained of epigastric discomfort and palpitations. A Holter monitor revealed no significant cardiac abnormalities; no chest radiograph was taken. In February 1993, she delivered a six-pound, 10-ounce baby without problem. She was not seen again until her pulmonary symptoms began in 1994.

Physical examination showed a pleasant, alert, and oriented young woman who was 62 inches tall and weighed 191 pounds. She was mildly tachypneic (respiratory rate = 20/min), but the examination was otherwise unremarkable. Blood cell counts, blood chemistry profile, urinalysis, ECG, and blood gas concentra-

The patient underwent operative reduction of the herniated viscera through a left subcostal incision. The ruptured diaphragm was repaired with 2-0 Ethibond suture using an interrupted horizontal mattress fashion; her recovery was uneventful and she is now asymptomatic.

Discussion

Rupture of the diaphragm has an honored place in the annals of medicine. The natural history of the condition was first described in 1541,¹ and incarceration of the colon in a defect of fingertip size eight months after a chest injury was described in 1579.² In 1853, Bowditch first diagnosed a post-traumatic diaphragmatic hernia prior to death.³

Both blunt and penetrating thoracoabdominal trauma can injure the diaphragm. Rupture occurs in about 0.8% of patients injured in motor vehicle crashes.⁴

Drs. Clancy and Maxwell are with the Departments of Surgery, UNC School of Medicine, Chapel Hill, New Hanover Regional Medical Center, and Coastal Area Health Education Center (AHEC), both in Wilmington. Drs. Kays and Butler are with the New Hanover Regional Medical Center and Coastal AHEC.

Pagliarello found diaphragmatic hernias in 2% of 2,204 multiple (mostly blunt) trauma patients,⁵ and an incidence of 5% has been reported in patients undergoing laparotomy for abdominal trauma.⁶ Although less common, diaphragm injury may be caused by hyperemesis gravidarum and post-operatively after esophageal or gastric surgery.

As in our patient, the most common modern cause of acquired diaphragmatic hernia is a motor vehicle crash, but it is rare to find it as an isolated phenomenon since serious associated injuries are the rule rather than the exception. Intra-abdominal organs are injured in 51%-90% of patients. The nature of the crash plays a role; Kearney pointed out that lateral impact collisions are three times more likely than frontal collisions to result in diaphragm rupture.

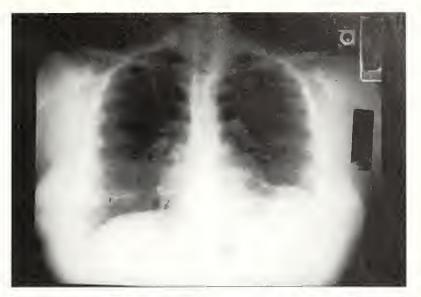

The pressure differences that exist between abdominal and thoracic cavities, the constant movement of the diaphragm with respiration, and daily changes in levels of exertion all prevent the healing of diaphragmatic tears and contribute to the progressive ascent of intra-abdominal contents into the thorax.

Although not so in our patient, the stomach is the viscus most commonly found in left-sided traumatic hernias. The spleen is also commonly herniated, but neither organ was located in the chest of our patient.

As one might expect, force of a magnitude sufficient to disrupt the diaphragm usually causes orthopedic, neurologic, and solid organ injury. Hood reviewed 429 patients and found that all had associated injuries. The presence of a traumatic hernia of the diaphragm should, therefore, be considered a marker for other more immediately life-threatening injuries. According to Boulanger, it is the nature and severity of associated injuries, not visceral herniation or strangulation, that accounts for most of the complications and mortality in patients with diaphragmatic rupture. 12

Gut strangulation, perforation, and mortality can occur, especially if diagnosis is delayed. It is difficult to estimate how often diagnosis is delayed or missed, but recent reports suggest a 10% incidence. ¹³ Feliciano says that late diagnosis is a result of the original injury to the diaphragm being missed, allowing delayed herniation to develop. ¹⁴ Delayed herniation may also occur after suture line disruption in a repaired diaphragm. Harms reported that in eight of 26 patients with diaphragm injuries, diagnosis was delayed from three days to three years. ¹⁵

common way that diaphragm injury is detected, but they are diagnostic in only 25%-50% of cases. 1,7,10 Radiographic signs of injury include elevation or obscuration of the diaphragm, basilar atelectasis or effusion, displaced loops of intestine, the presence of a stomach bubble or nasogastric tube in chest, air fluid levels in the chest, and mediastinal shift. Clinicians usually associate herniation with the left hemidiaphragm as in our patient, but right-sided hernias are being reported with surprising frequency. Harms reported that 27% of diaphragmatic hernias were right-sided.¹⁵

Although solitary herniation of the diaphragm is uncommon, failure to recognize it may lead to significant late morbidity and mortality. Our patient's case demonstrates both unusual and familiar clinical features. The medical history included a telltale car crash in the recent past. Her chronic upper abdominal complaints and progressive pulmonary symptoms suggest diaphragmatic hernia as an etiologic factor. Her history demonstrates how diaphragmatic injury can manifest itself months or years after blunt torso trauma, even in patients who were not originally hospitalized and had no associated injuries. The subtlety of chest x-ray changes makes it easy to miss the diagnosis. A CT scan should be used to evaluate patients with a history of blunt trauma and any suggestive changes on chest x-ray.

Community Clinical Oncology Program as a Recruitment Vehicle for Cancer Control Research

The Southeast Cancer Control Consortium Experience

Electra D. Paskett, PhD, M. Robert Cooper, MD, Cecilia R. DeGraffinreid, MHS, Charles L. Spurr, MD, and Therese A. Dolecek, PhD, RD

In an effort to bring state-of-the-art cancer treatment to cancer patients in the community, the National Cancer Institute (NCI) began the Community Clinical Oncology Program (CCOP) in 1983. The goal of the CCOP is to get community physicians involved in clinical trial research. The interest in community-level participation began with the realization that most (85%) cancer patients are treated by community physicians. Since the CCOP began, more than 50% of all patients participating in formal NCI clinical research protocols are entered by community oncologists. ^{2,3}

The initial success of the CCOP led the NCl to expand its focus in 1987 to include the development and implementation of cancer control research through the existing clinical trials network. There are two reasons for this expansion: 1) The national goal of reducing cancer mortality by the year 2000⁴ requires intensive efforts in cancer control research, and 2) communities have vast resources available—cancer education programs, screening clinics, and outreach mechanisms—that can be mobilized to launch cancer control programs. Researchers in CCOP communities provide a link to accessible populations of cancer patients, family members, high-risk populations, and normal participants for cancer control intervention studies. 6

The CCOP has focused its cancer control research on cancer prevention, screening, and early detection; chemoprevention; dietary intervention and smoking cessation; continuing care; pain control; and rehabilitation. If the CCOP is to succeed in implementing large scale cancer control research, it will need broad participation by primary health care providers and specialists (surgeons, urologists, gynecologists, gastroenterologists, and internists) in the community because these physicians are the gatekeepers who have access to individuals eligible for cancer control trials.5 These physicians have not traditionally been involved in clinical cancer research. A survey by Hunter et al,⁶ found that only half of the 52 funded CCOPs reported that 10 or more community physicians from other disciplines actively supported efforts in clinical trial research. Most supportive were the surgeons (36%), but family practitioners, gastroenterologists, and internists made up only 16% of the referring physicians.

Now the CCOP's cancer control research focuses on large-scale prevention in communities.⁶ Since access to large numbers of healthy but at-risk individuals is needed for most cancer control projects, the CCOP is looking for ways to get primary care physicians to participate in and support this research.⁵ This paper describes how we developed and tested a method to involve community physicians in an NCI-sponsored cancer prevention study, the Polyp Prevention Trial, through the network of the largest CCOP funded by the NCI, the Southeast Cancer Control Consortium.

Dr. Paskett, Dr. Cooper, Ms. DeGraffinreid, and Dr. Dolecek are with the Comprehensive Cancer Center of Wake Forest University, Bowman Gray School of Medicine, Winston-Salem 27157. Dr. Paskett, Ms. DeGraffinreid, and Dr. Dolecek are also with Bowman Gray's Department of Public Health Sciences. Until his death last spring, Dr. Spurr was with the Southeast Cancer Control Consortium, which he founded in Winston-Salem (US Public Health Service contract U10-CA-45808, National Cancer Institute, National Institutes of Health, Department of Health and Human Services). This work was supported by Public Health Service contract N01-CN-05322, National Cancer Institute, National Institutes of Health, US Department of Health and Human Services.

Methods

Setting. The Comprehensive Cancer Center of Wake Forest University has served as a research base for cancer education and treatment studies for more than two decades.⁷ The essential steps it used for community development included visiting and training periods for practitioners, weekly clinical conferences, and the development of an in-community chemotherapy program for metastatic carcinoma of the breast.

In 1975, the number of medical oncologists in the referral area had increased significantly, providing an opportunity for collaboration in clinical trials. This program evolved because of strong participation by practicing oncologists, and a coalition of relationships between the Cancer Center, the oncologists and their community hospitals, and primary care physicians. In 1982, the 145 oncologists who made up the Piedmont Oncology Association were funded as a regional group by the NCI. Funding continued through 1985 when the primary focus turned to the CCOP. In 1987, II Piedmont Oncology Association community groups organized as the Southeast Cancer Control Consortium, Inc. Their application was funded in 1987 and funding continues through May 2000.

"The Cancer Center and the Consortium operate in a 'covenant' relationship, which provides autonomy for each of the respective organizations..."

The Comprehensive Cancer Center and the Southeast Cancer Control Consortium operate in a "covenant" relationship, which provides autonomy for each of the respective organizations based on trust that each will fulfill its expectations and responsibilities. To further ensure its autonomy, the Consortium was formed as a non-profit corporation under NC corporation law. It is controlled and administered through a chairperson and executive Committee with a board of directors. Its activities are defined in the by-laws of the Corporation.

The Consortium has community members in Asheville, Hickory, Charlotte, Winston-Salem, Greensboro, Goldsboro, and Raleigh; Martinsville and Danville, VA; Kingsport, TN; Columbia, Florence, Charleston, and Greenwood, SC; and Savannah, GA. The Consortium headquarters has established excellent administrative, educational, and clinical working relationships with community hospital administrations, community oncologists, and data management teams.

To coordinate the Cancer Control Program of CCOP, each community designates a medical oncologist as "community leader"; colleague oncologists are qualified as full participants for the registration of patients. These oncologists carry out their activities in the community hospital, its clinics, and private practice offices. Each community has a coordinator, highly trained in clinical trials and community education activities, who works closely with the individual data managers associated with the physicians participating in the clinical trials process. Coordination of the consortium program is carried out through the headquarters office in Winston-Salem.

Polyp Prevention Trial. This randomized trial is designed to evaluate the effect of a low-fat, high-fiber, fruit- and vegetable-enriched diet on the recurrence of adenomatous polyps in patients who have recently had an adenomatous polyp removed from the colon or rectum. A total of 2,079 participants have been recruited at eight clinical centers throughout the continental United States. Half of the participants are randomly allocated to receive intensive dietary counseling; the other half are instructed to continue their usual diet. All patients undergo colonoscopy after one and four years.8 The Comprehensive Cancer Center is one of the participating clinical centers; it began recruiting for the Polyp Prevention Trial in June 1991.

Lead oncologist model. To identify and recruit sufficient numbers of eligible participants, we have recruited community physicians (gastroenterologists, surgeons, and internists) to support the study. Three communities (Winston-Salem, Greensboro, and Charlotte) were selected because each was relatively close to the investigative team in Winston-Salem, each had a sufficient number of colon polypectomies performed each year, and each had a well-established treatment clinical trial network in place. The Consortium lead oncologist in each community was contacted before submission of the Polyp Prevention Trial grant application to determine whether the community would support the study. All agreed.

were asked to contact physicians who performed colonoscopies to explain the study and ascertain interest..."

When the Comprehensive Cancer Center received funding, each lead oncologist was contacted by the investigators to explain their role in the study. These oncologists were asked to contact all physicians in their community who performed colonoscopies to explain the study, ascertain interest in participation, and invite them to meet with the clinical center investigators.

At a meeting in each community we explained the study to interested physicians and lead oncologists and explained what participation would involve for them and their patients. The lead oncologist conducted each meeting and introduced the clinical center investigators and staff to the community physicians. Physicians were given written information about the study, a copy of the protocol, and a list of phone numbers for the clinical center investigators and staff. Discussion focused on study goals and objectives, study personnel interaction with office staff and patients, whether participation would impose any additional workload on office operations, the responsibility for care of enrolled patients, and study-specific procedures.

Physicians were assured that their workload would not significantly increase because of participation in the study. Their role would be to 1) review the lists of potential participants and approve contact by Polyp Prevention Trial staff for recruitment, 2) follow the colonoscopy protocol during colonoscopies (not substantially different from their usual practice), 3) discuss the study briefly with potential participants, often just by distributing a brochure, 4) sign initial letters before mailing to prospective participants, and 5) allow study staff to review medical records in their office. Physicians were told that all medical care of participants would remain their responsibility.

Every time a patient was enrolled, the lead oncologist sent a letter to the referring physician regarding the patient's involvement. In addition, participating physicians meet at a yearly dinner hosted by the lead oncologist in each community to update the physicians on study progress, changes or modifications in the protocol, and recruitment within each community. Questions, problems, or comments about the study are elicited. Physicians are given sample recipe items such as high-fiber bean cake, and the annual top recruiting physician from each city is honored. Scientific sessions are planned for future annual meetings. Lastly, the NCl provides newsletters to all participating physicians on a bi-annual basis.

Results

Participation rates. Since the Comprehensive Cancer Center's funding began in September 1990, 52 gastroenterologists and 10 other physicians in the three communities agreed to participate. These physicians represent 86% of eligible community physicians. Table 1 shows participation rates by community. Most participating physicians (84%) are gastroenterologists. Seven Charlotte physicians are surgeons, two Greensboro physicians are surgeons, and one Winston-Salem physician is an internist.

Participant recruitment. On average, each physician has enrolled six Polyp Prevention Trial participants (Table 2), but the rate was higher in Charlotte. Participants recruited from community gastroenterology practices accounted for the overwhelming majority of study participants (98.8%).

Yearly activities Annual physician meetings were held in each of the three communities at the beginning years 1 and 2. At the first meeting, 89% of participating physicians attended, but at the second meeting, only 53% attended. Community physicians were more likely to attend than university medical center physicians.

Discussion

The CCOP has been referred to as a network of population resources for cancer control research. Unfortunately, only one-third of the CCOPs have met their goal for participation in cancer control research. To facilitate such research within the CCOP, the clinical trial network must include physicians who can provide access to healthy individuals who will participate in large-scale prevention and early detection studies. 5

This report describes the "lead oncologist model" used by the Southeast Cancer Control Consortium to demonstrate that physicians other than oncologists are willing to participate in cancer control research through the CCOP mechanism. Using this model, we were able to get 86% of physicians to participate. Dietrich et al,10 were able to recruit only 37% of eligible physicians for a cancer control study. Although they used physician recruiters to approach community physicians, no CCOP was involved. Our study used a CCOP network that was already established and experienced in each community. Thus, the lead oncologist, who served as recruiter, had an already established positive reputation for cancer research in the community.

The Council on Scientific Affairs surveyed 1,000 American Medical Association physicians about their willingness to participate in clinical trial research and about the factors that might inhibit their participation. Seventy-two percent said that they were willing to participate; responses varied by specialty: Obstetrician/gynecologists had the least interest (62%); internists and surgeons and radiologists had more (74% and 77% were willing to participate, respectively). Factors reported to inhibit participation included: lack of time (32%), bureaucratic administration of research (26%), professional liability concerns (12%), ethics of patient care (9%), lack of interest (6%), and inconsistent reimbursement (3%).

The lead oncologistor the study team addressed each of these barriers during recruitment into the trial. Physicians who chose not to participate in the study cited lack of time as their main reason, but the study team designed procedures to minimize the referring physician burden. Members of the study team made office visits to the participating physicians' practices to evaluate office operations and to determine how best to identify potentially eligible subjects without disrupting the daily flow of office work. Study team members carried out chart review and completed all necessary study forms.

The Polyp Prevention Trial recruitment experience suggests that having a lead oncologist with high visibility and a good reputation among other community physicians probably enhances participation. However, it is difficult to distinguish whether this is due to the reputation of the CCOP in the community or is a characteristic of the community that allows it to support a CCOP. CCOP communities are inherently different from non-CCOP communities. CCOP communities have twice as many incident cancer cases and have more medical resources than non-CCOP communities. Thus, these communities tend to be more focused on cancer and are better able to mount resources for research.

The successful involvement of referring physicians in Consortium communities is not surprising. Several predictors for successful accrual to cancer control protocols emerged from the CCOP II evaluation. Availability of protocols was the major predictor, followed by involvement in activities sponsored by the research base, a demonstrated link to community physicians (especially physicians with access to patients), and personal contact with non-CCOP physicians. In the case of the Polyp Prevention Trial, the lead oncologist's role involved these latter activities; the Trial study team assumed the responsibility for the former two activities. In addition, physicians who attended annual physician meetings recruited more participants to the study.

McKinney et al,⁵ have identified three strategies the CCOP uses that are associated with rapid assimilation of cancer control studies: 1) proactive planning including the formation of a cancer control research committee and "idea champions" to promote cancer control research, 2) a staged approach to defining and introducing this research, and 3) the creation of multiple bridging mechanisms to link cancer prevention and control studies with ongoing research activities.

The lead oncologist model uses these strategies. The lead oncologist represents an "idea champion" who can promote the study within the community. Participation of these communities in the Polyn Prevention Trial follows a history of successful participation in smaller cancer control studies and many clinical treatment studies. Mechanisms of cooperation and trust had already been established by participation in these other studies. In addition, the lead oncologist slowly introduced the study goals into the community, thus allowing the idea of participation to be explored before the exact details of the study were introduced.

We believe that the lead oncologist model facilitates cancer control research within CCOP communities. This model not only allows scientists to facilitate reaching the research goals, but it operates within already existing networks and maintains community ownership and pride in participation. More importantly, if protocols are carefully designed to minimize the workload of the referring physician, larger numbers of non-CCOP physicians are willing to participate. This model should be exportable to all CCOPs to facilitate the progress of cancer control research, especially for large-scale prevention and early detection studies.

Counseling Women Who Smoke

To the Editor:

Project ASSIST (American Stop Smoking Intervention Study) would like to reproduce 3,000 to 4,000 copies of "The Tobacco Control Task Force of the NC Medical Society," from the January Journal (NC Med J 1995;56:24-5).

We would like to include this article in a counseling guide we are preparing for health care providers. The guide will focus on pregnancy and the childbearing years and will contain information that providers need to counsel women about quitting smoking. It will be distributed throughout the state, primarily to health care providers who provide perinatal care (physicians, nurses, nurse-midwives, nutritionists, etc.).

Instructions for Authors

The North Carolina Medical Journal is a medium for communication with and by members of the medical community of this state. The Journal will consider for publication articles relating to and illuminating medical science, practice, and history; editorials and opinion pieces; letters; personal accounts; poetry and whimsical musings; and photographs and drawings. Papers that relate to the present, past, or future practice of the health professions in North Carolina are especially pertinent, but manuscripts reflecting other perspectives or topics are welcomed. Prospective authors should feel free to discuss potential articles with the editors.

Manuscript Preparation

Prepare papers according to the "Uniform Requirements for Manuscripts Submitted to Biomedical Journals" (N Engl J Med 1991;324:424-8) with the following exceptions: 1) no abstract is needed; 2) no running title is needed; and 3) report measurements in metric units; use of the International System of Units (S1) is optional.

Submit a cover letter and either a 3 1/2-inch hard disk or 5 1/4-inch floppy computer disk that contains the text written in MS DOS- or Macintosh-compatible format, and at least one hard copy of the text. Double space text with one-inch margins. Please do not "format" the text (e.g. no variations in type size, no bold face, no italics, no embedded endnotes).

Submit illustrations, in duplicate, in the form of highquality color 35mm slides or 5-by-7-inch or 8-by-10-inch glossy photographs, or as black-and-white glossy prints (5by-7-inch or 8-by-10-inch). Label all illustrations with author's name, number them sequentially according to their position in the text, and indicate the orientation of the images, if necessary. Do not write directly on the backs of prints. This can damage them. If figures require printing in four-color process, the author may be asked to pay printing fees or a portion thereof.

Type figure legends, double-spaced, on a separate sheet of paper. Tables should be typed, double-spaced, one to a single sheet of paper. All tables must have titles and consecutive Arabic numbers. Include tables, graphs, or charts on disk, if possible.

Keep references to a minimum (no more than 15, preferably 10 or fewer), retaining those that document important points. The "Uniform Requirements" cited above contain the format for references. Authors are responsible for the accuracy and pertinence of all citations.

Avoid abbreviations entirely if possible; keep them to a minimum if not. When used, completely define abbreviations at the first point of usage in the text.

Manuscript Review and Editing

A medically qualified editor reads all manuscripts and, in most instances, sends them out for further review by one or more other members of the North Carolina Medical Society. Authors' cover letters must include a line that states that their submitted manuscripts are not under consideration for publication elsewhere. Decisions to publish or not are made by the editors, advised by the peer reviewers.

We encourage a relatively informal writing style since we believe this improves communication. Imagine yourself talking with your unseen audience—as long as this doesn't lead you to scientific or linguistic inaccuracy. Be brief, clear, simple, and precise.

We edit accepted manuscripts for clarity, style, and conciseness. Except for letters, authors receive a copy of the edited manuscript for their review and approval before publication. Manuscripts not accepted will not be returned.

Authors retain copyright to articles published in the North Carolina Medical Journal, but the North Carolina Medical Society copyrights the contents of each entire issue. Requests for permission to reprint all or any part of a published article must be submitted in writing to the address below and negotiated with the author and editor jointly. Reprinted material must carry a credit line identifying that it appeared in the North Carolina Medical Journal.

Cancer Pain Management in North Carolina

Physician Knowledge, Attitude, and Behavior

Gwen Konsler, RN, BSN, Jo Ann Dalton, RN, EdD, John Carlson, MS, and Jim Atkins, MD

To help patients with cancer pain, 46 states have developed approaches to its management. In North Carolina, we began work on a State Pain Initiative 1990. As part of the program, we surveyed North Carolina physicians, nurses, pharmacists, and social workers to determine their knowledge of and problems with cancer pain management. We report here the results of the physician survey.

We sent a questionnaire, modified with permission from one developed by the Wisconsin Cancer Pain Initiative, 1 to 1,100 randomly selected members of the NC Medical Society. There were 42 multiple-choice questions covering knowledge of opioid use, laws regarding narcotic use, barriers to pain management, attitudes about cancer pain, and personal experience with chronic pain. Survey scores represent the percentage of correct answers to each question; average scores for each category represent the total number of correct scores divided by the number of respondents.

One hundred eighty questionnaires (16%) were returned. Because of the low response rate, results should be interpreted with caution, but they are still interesting and important to health professionals throughout the state. At the least, they demonstrate the need for further education about cancer pain management strategies and practice.

The average age of respondents was 50.5 years (range 32-85); 91% were male; 98%, white. They had practiced for an average of 18 years; 38% of respondents practiced surgery; 21%, family practice or general practice; 10%, internal medicine; 6%, hematology/oncology; 4%, pediatrics; and 22%, other specialties. On average, these doctors saw 10 cancer patients per year (range 0-1,000). Thirty-five percent of the physicians practiced in cities of 100,000 or more; 38%, in towns of 25,000-100,000; and 27%, in towns of less than 25,000.

Survey Results

The average number of correct responses to the 14 questions related to knowledge of opioid use was 8.5 (range 2-14). Physicians who had been in practice less than 20 years (n=100) had a slightly higher average score (8.7). Physicians who cared for more than 10 cancer patients per year also had a slightly higher average score (9.0). None of the differences were statistically significant.

Most (84%) respondents believed that all or nearly all cancer patients suffer pain sometime during their illness.

Fifty-two percent of respondents believed that 80% of pain could be relieved with treatment, but only 28% believed that all pain problems could be relieved.

About three-fourths of the respondents thought that management of cancer pain was a problem, that the pain was usually caused by the cancer itself, and that most patients are under-medicated. Almost all (95%) believed that increasing requests for analgesics indicated progression of the disease or tolerance to the analgesic. Sixty-eight percent of respondents said that psychological dependence on narcotics happened occasionally or rarely, and 97% believed that suicidal overdose with narcotics occurred only occasionally or rarely.

Seventy-nine percent of respondents said that morphine was their drug of choice for severe chronic cancer pain; 6% used meperidine. Only 18% knew that a metabolite of meperidine causes central nervous system excitation. Almost half (48%) stated that they did not know this, and 34% answered the question incorrectly. Only 28% knew that an equi-analgesic oral dose of morphine is three times larger than the parenteral dose; 43% did not know the correct conversion factor, and 29% answered incorrectly.

Most doctors said that treating chronic cancer pain with opioids for more than several months is lawful and acceptable practice. However, 41% thought that prescribing opioids for more than several months to treat pain of non-malignant origin, although lawful, is not acceptable practice, and 65% believed that prescribing opioids to patients with a history of drug abuse is probably a violation of federal or state law. Thirty-six percent of physicians were concerned about patient addiction and 10% about use of the patient's narcotics by family members for non-intended reasons. Of the 65 physicians who provided written comments regarding barriers to effective cancer pain management, 11 said they were worried about being investigated for their prescribing practices.

Forty-three percent of respondents reported that they knew of pain management resources in NC; hospice, the resource mentioned most often, was cited by 15% of respondents.

Comments

Problems in cancer pain management may arise from physicians' knowledge or attitudes. We received fewer correct responses to questions about knowledge of use of opioids and the regulation of that use than about pain in general. The doctors responding to our survey believed that pain can be relieved, but only a small proportion expected complete relief and most thought that cancer patients are under-medicated.

We found that physicians worried more about being investigated themselves than about misuse of drugs by patients or others. Although the physicians were concerned about scrutiny of their prescribing practices, they were knowledgeable about general regulations. Only a small proportion of physicians expressed concern about patient addiction.

North Carolina physicians would benefit from education about cancer pain management. The recently published AHCPR Guidelines on the Management of Cancer Pain² provide a well-researched, concise overview of management of this difficult problem. Copies may be obtained by calling the Cancer Information Service or writing the NC Cancer Pain Initiative at the NC Division of the American Cancer Society, P.O. Box 27625, Raleigh, NC 27603.

We hope that the doctors of North Carolina will utilize resources like the Cancer Information Service, the NC Cancer Pain Initiative, and the various cancer centers throughout the state. We challenge them to participate in the national effort of making pain relief a priority in their practices.

First Photographs of Heaven: Poems That Make Earth a Better Place to Be Coulehan, Jack. Troy, Maine: Nightshade Press, 1994, 60 pages, ISBN 1-879205-49-1, $9.95

Reviewed by Doris Iarovici, MD, Resident, Department of Psychiatry, Duke University Medical Center, Durham

In these days of high-tech treatment, the art of medicine is often overlooked because of the more visible science of medicine. How refreshing, then, to come across the writing of Jack Coulehan, a physician, epidemiologist, and poet, who remembers that at the core of every patient is a person. In this, his latest collection of poems, Coulehan examines life, death, family bonds, sickness, and the art of medicine in language so compelling and lyrical that it's hard to imagine that he doesn't spend all his time writing poetry.

Readers of the Journal of the American Medical Association will recognize some of the poems originally published there, but many other poems first appeared in a variety of literary magazines. And for sure, Coulehan's poetry speaks to a much broader audience than just health care professionals. True, he often writes about illness and patients and healers, but he focuses on the humanity of all involved, highlighting the human dignity that is often the price of hope for a cure, as in "Whatever Else":

"Of course, I wanted to save you from all this—from machines and plastic tubes, from the shooters with their dyes, from the guys who scan your organs for the truth, from waits in cold rooms

The narrator in this particular poem is unable to prevent these dehumanizing procedures from taking place because they are, in fact, the path to the "truth"...the person whom the narrator addresses has a stenosed aortic valve, and has to suffer "all this" to get better. Coulehan recognizes that sometimes the wish to avoid dehumanization is futile: a trade-off for a high-tech treatment, but his recognition of the wish itself in part rehumanizes the patient.

Coulehan's poems illuminate some of the ethical dilemmas facing doctors these days, yet the language avoids preachiness or pedantry. As a physician, he taps into some of the deepest, often unarticulated fears of us who practice medicine:

that skill and knowledge are, in the end, insufficient tools against the forces of disease and death, that we can prolong life without improving it, and that sometimes our attempts to make people better, in fact leave them worse off. In "The Resurrection Trade," he laments,

We cheat the dead of dying, with machines instead of spade..."

But it is not with an unfailingly critical eye that Coulehan regards medicine. He is merely realistic in trying to capture the rewards and the cost. He acknowledges the gifts that physicians often unwittingly give their patients, writing about the gifts that patients give them, as in "The Act of Love":

"...even crepitant joints are modestly silent and stand aside

when Celia hands me a potted plant for my office—an act of Christian love, she says, not a sign of being personal

As for me, I'm stunned out of the ordinary anger at failing to help her..."

Coulehan's poems evoke an aching longing, the pain of his characters and their losses. His words depict patients as people, helping the reader identify with the disfigured, the grotesque, the dying, the drunk. In "The Six Hundred Pound Man," of whom, he writes, "nothing remains," he conjures an image of a neophyte doctor remembering his patient, recalling in search of bougainvillea blossoming his thighs, of women who rise to touch him tenderly with ointment...

"...those flamboyant trees that flame his flanks,

As I enter for the first time this medicine circle...

and this worthless and alien body, this six hundred pound man, I discover him beautiful."

The writing occasionally gets a bit flowery or melodramatic, but for the most part it is suffused with empathy, transforming the grotesque into the beautiful. One can only guess that his empathetic identification makes Coulehan a better doctor. These poems demonstrate that he is first and foremost a caring, a thoughtful human being. If they sadden the reader by bringing an awareness of the limitations of the science of medicine, they also cheer with a reminder of the universality of the human condition. They sound a eall for us to treat one another as kindred spirits. \square

The Prostate Book Rouse, Stephen N. Scranton, PA: W.W. Norton & Co., 1992, 256 pages, ISBN 0-393-03387-2, $22.50

Reviewed by Raymond E. Joyner, MD, Durham Urology Associates, PA, Durham

The Prostate Book is a revised edition of the original 1988 text. It is written for laypeople to help them understand medical problems related to the prostate gland. It is noteworthy because public interest in the prostate, and especially prostate cancer, has increased in the past few years.

This is a timely and informative edition, comprehensive in its coverage of benign and malignant prostate disease. Its one shortcoming may be that it is so in-depth that all readers, except the most serious, will find it too detailed. This book, however, can be a tremendous source of information to a patient with questions about the prostate. It can be particularly useful in helping patients deal with the diagnosis and treatment of prostate cancer, which is currently such a hotly debated topic. It should make good literature for a urologist's waiting room and may be recommended to highly selected patients.

Aphorisms of the Month

Daniel J. Sexton, MD, Editor

"Potpourri"

The public has an insatiable curiosity to know everything, except what is worth knowing. —Oscar Wilde

To get on these days, it isn't what you know or even who you know that counts—it's usually what you know about who you know.

—Epson's Compleat Office Companion

If you mean to profit, learn to please.

-Charles Churchill

Medicine is the only profession which has bestowed unquestionable benefits on mankind. —Jo Grimond

There are three things which the public will always clamor for, sooner or later: namely: Novelty, novelty, novelty.

—Thomas Hood

Statistics are like a bikini. What they reveal is suggestive, but what they conceal is vital. —Aaron Levenstein

Success is never blamed. —Thomas Fuller

Time is a merciless enemy, as it is also a merciless friend and healer.

—Gandhi

Fools and obstinate men make lawyers rich.

—Thomas Fuller

Management seems to have concluded that the answer to most management problems lies with management itself.

-Willard E. Bennet

What can a map tell you about a computer system?

Plenty — if, like this one, it shows how many medical offices in the Carolinas use a particular practice management system to run more efficiently, effectively, and profitably.

For example, it might show how a 16-year commitment to "Working for Physicians" has resulted in over 800 installations in North and South Carolina.

It might bring home how features like "on-the-fly" refiling, encounterform tracking, and direct transmission to North Carolina Medicare,
Medicaid, and Blue Cross/Blue Shield (with no per-claim charges) are improving physicians' revenue.

It could clarify how critical "one-call" support can be in helping offices stay productive — how telephone support staff, software and hardware engineers, technicians, trainers, and a fleet of service vans can provide support unmatched in the industry.

It might demonstrate how ongoing research and development brought innovations like the first integrated, direct electronic claims transmission in a practice management system.

Or it could validate the concept of regional focus: By selling systems only in the Southeast, a computer company can keep customers up-todate on the latest insurance filing requirements.

It could emphasize the flexibility of multi-user, multi-tasking software that runs on the most popular operating system in the world.

And it could illustrate the value of having a computer vendor with a vision for the future and the expertise to make that vision work for you.
